[illegible] WORLD'S CRISIS.

[illegible]D BY BELIEVERS IN THE IMMEDIATE COMING OF CHRIST.

BOSTON, MASS., JANUARY 5, 1859. VOL. VIII. NO. 18.

[illegible] important to look to ourselves closely [illegible]fully, and to be expeditious about the matter. To make the required improvement, we must see where we have failed, and how the past can be altered for the better. To see this clearly and at once, we must look well to the past.

The blessings of the past are many, and, as it regards the source of these benefits, this is settled. "Every good and perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." In him we live, move, and have our being. Life is, therefore, not only the gift of God, but it is a great blessing. The end of life is to glorify God and enjoy him forever. Our life is in his hand; he is the God of the spirits of all flesh; and our great concern should be to rightly improve the precious moments allotted. The real value of life is enhanced when blessed with health to the possessor. Health makes life pleasant and endurable. How much better we are prepared to meet the evils of time, while in its enjoyment; how weak are our efforts when it is impaired! Those who have been favored with this blessing the past year, and improved it to the glory of God, and in advancing the interests of their fellow men, have cause to rejoice. But how many there are who have neglected to approriate this blessing to advance the common interest. And may we not say to them, as a gentle reproof, as the apostle said to those [illegible]ing in interest in his day, "For [illegible] past of our life may suffice [illegible]ought the will of the Gentiles."

[illegible]de still more blessed by abundance [illegible]d and raiment. "Give me," said [illegible] neither poverty nor riches, feed me [illegible] convenient for me." It is [illegible] enjoy these favors, but another [illegible] with a heart filled with gratitude [illegible]fulness for them. Have we, while [illegible]r enjoyment, thought of the dest[illegible]f others? Have we, in secret, lifted [illegible]umble petitions to God in their beh[illegible]verty has afflicted many during the [illegible]r. How many, better, perhaps, th[illegible]lves, have suffered dire want, and [illegible]ffer, while gaunt famine stares [illegible] face! How the heart of the [illegible] been made to bleed, while the [illegible] looked so wishful for food, or [illegible]es have cried, "Give, give!" [illegible]d of utter despair has lowered [illegible] communities, while the great [illegible]rovisions, and the failure of [illegible] have stared them in the face! [illegible]ils have been aggravated by [illegible] approach of winter, whose footsteps [illegible]lways signalized by the whistling of [illegible] wild winds through the crevices of the [illegible] shelter! Who can tell with what [illegible]ngs of heart, with what elegiac ex[illegible]sions, the poor, half-starved child has [illegible]ulated, "Give me this day my daily [illegible]d!" What suffering has been experi[illegible]d on the great deep, by the poor [illegible]ked mariner; clinging to his frail bark, [illegible]ing, it may be, on the remains of a [illegible]w sailor, but now the last of that other[illegible] unpalatable food is gone! What [illegible]ghts are revolved in his mind, while [illegible] storm seems to mock his last efforts, [illegible]he endeavoring, before relinquishing [illegible]rasp, to offer to heaven a prayer—a prayer, for the distant and the loved! [illegible] a struggle of mind and heart, [illegible]a conflict within the breast of this [illegible] skeleton of humanity, reduced to a [illegible]w through dire want, while he en[illegible]res to give up, to resign his family [illegible]riends. Even now, while he sinks i[illegible] swoon-like state, and life seems well n[illegible]gone, he imagines himself at home, w[illegible]he loved, where there is enough and to [illegible]e; and in the ecstasy of the moment, he [illegible]s to be mocked by disappointment and [illegible]th!

N[illegible] to the blessings we have noticed of li[illegible]health, food and raiment, we may speak [illegible] the social, which result from that mutu[illegible] intercourse and reciprocity of feeling [illegible]ifested by men, considered not merely [illegible] individuals, but as an aggregate body of society. Man is said to be a social [illegible]. "It is not good," said the Lord [illegible] man should be alone." God designed him for society. When he, therefore, through cowardice—for it is nothing else—retires from the world and becomes a recluse, sequestered from the benefits of human society; a stranger to the duties and pleasures which result from this heaven appointed intercourse; he is guilty of violating the commands of God, and endeavors, by his monkish course, to defeat the very end of his existence. He deserts his post, because of the trials which threaten; he has not courage enough to breast the storm and meet the evils of life; and hence, tortoise-like, he draws his head into his shell, exclaiming, in the spirit of selfishness, "Every man for himself!!" But this, thank heaven, is not a real specimen of humanity; if it was, the language of Gen. 6: 6, "It repented the Lord that he had made man," would have a significance which it has not at present! This we know is the exception, not the general rule.

There are thousands in community whose hearts are true. There is a humaneness about them, without which man is worse than a brute—he is a tyrant. How heaven-like is this compassion and tenderness manifested between man and man. How the bosom heaves with emotion in hope of administering to the wants of the hopeless sons of toil. "The cause," said one, "that I knew not I searched out." How many "God bless you's" have come from the hearts of those whose countenances have been lighted up through these acts of kindness! There is a peculiar felicity in these errands of mercy. It is said by one to be more "blessed to give than receive." "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord." Is there not an inward satisfaction realized by the merciful, the humane, that is truly [illegible] Here benevolence has full play. Benevolence is the disposition, munificence is its development. One is the duty, the other is the practice. It is by these kind offices that society is bound together; without them, earth would become a pandemonium. If others render to us in this department, we should cast in our mite to make it entirely reciprocal. Who of us wishes to give up these blessings, or be deprived of these social pleasures? There are thousands of mankind who know nothing of their sweets, being destitute of civilization or civil liberty, the very foundation of social life. We cannot too highly appreciate these blessings, they are intimately connected with our well being. Life would become a blank without them; it is all that holds society together. Heaven has never approbated a disregard of them. Wherever selfishness has become paramount, these blessings are comparatively lost. It matters not whether it has developed itself in the aggregation of the shining dust, or otherwise; the results have been invariably the same.

Aside from the acts of mercy and benevolence, which are blessings resulting from social life, we are favored with a thousand little civilities which serve to make life pleasant and agreeable. Notice the complaisance, the courtesy, together with those kind offices of love and respect which meet the wants and desires of others. How these acts cause the bosom to swell with emotion, producing a reciprocity of feeling which serves to hold mankind together in a kind of "universal brotherhood." This is just the opposite of that state of rudeness and barbarity of uncivilized nations. It is the refinement and politeness of civil life which distinguishes the two, making one what the other is not. One is a state of nature without any culture or improvement, and hence, reaping the fruit whose seed was sown by ignorance and her sister superstition; the other, of cultivation and refinement; having advanced from the darkness to the light, scattering joy and gladness wherever it comes. This is a state of improvement, of the enlargement of the mind, the expansion of intellect; a state in which gracious feelings are cultivated, all of which are aided by political and civil liberty, or the institutions of free government; that is a state of nature in which, though there are many changes, yet no improvement; where the mind is enchained by ignorance, while the darkness, grosser than that of Egypt, precluding the least ray of light, lowers, like a heavy cloud, enshrouding the soul in impenetrable gloom!

The blessings of which we have spoken are never lightly esteemed, except by those who are selfish and ignorant. Fanaticism ignores the good in this department; she sees nothing but the religious element, and that only as "trees walking!" It is but a one-eyed affair at best, being destitute of the sweets of social life.

But again, there is still another element which holds an important place; it is the religious. This, though noticed last, is the first, being antecedent—and in importance having superior claims. As the social owes, to a great extent, its existence to the civil, so does the civil, in a good degree, borrow from the religious. Civil liberty, which is a freedom from the arbitrary will of others, which freedom is secured by law, that restrains one man from injuring another, is certainly influenced by the religious. Wherever civil liberty is enjoyed, there you find the christian religion; and in proportion as the Bible is shut out and its principles ignored, that liberty is abridged, and tyranny and oppression are secured! The Bible recognizes the religious as paramount to all others; this is clearly set forth in both Testaments. Even as far back as the patriarchal regimen, the first lessons taught to the rising generation was the fear of the Lord. "And unto man he said, Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding."

Religion has blessings which can be found in no other system. It has made provision for all the ills of human life, and is adapted to every condition of fallen humanity. The blessings of the gospel are very numerous, answering every demand, and meeting every want. Go where you will, be conditioned as you may, it meets your expectations, it draws from its infinite fullness, and appropriates according to the demand. What infinite favors it has lavished upon the nation, dispelling the gross darkness that has enshrouded them for centuries, blessing them with hope and immortality. There is, perhaps, no entire nation which has received it, at least practically; but millions have been made its happy recipients. How the heart of the poor benighted pagan has been made to rejoice through the self-denying and self-sacrificing spirit of the soldiers of the cross! The sound has gone forth from one end of the land to the other, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward man." How many thousands have been made to rejoice, old and young; age with its silvered locks, and youth with its buoyant hope, have bowed at the same altar, and experienced the same blessing. It would seem that the angel of mercy hovered over, anxious to pour out such a blessing as had not been realized since the first century. What changes were wrought in whole families! Once careless and profane, but now bowing at the throne of grace; father and mother, brothers and sisters. The infidel has thrown away his doubts and believes to the saving of the soul. The inebriate has laid aside his intoxicating cup; his senses are no longer disordered; his mind is relieved from its stupor; he no longer raves frantically, but now sits and is clothed in his right mind! The courtesan no longer pursues her unseemly course; truth has impressed the mind, calling hope into requisition; the heart becomes softened, purity now reigns in the soul, and chastity in the life. This is the work of the Gospel. How it triumphs! what victories it has achieved! what laurels it has won! It is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." "In every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." It is free for all mankind. "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

These are some of the blessings offered to mankind. How have they been improved? Who are made better by them? Have we, through their influence, made any advance, morally, intellectually, or religiously? It is impossible to remain stationary; we are either on the advance or retrograde; either being made better or worse; either growing in grace and the knowledge of the truth, or losing our vitality and are being enveloped in darkness. How is the matter with us? Can we say from the heart that our path grows brighter with every succeeding year? Would it be said to us, if called to an account, "Well done, good and faithful servant;" or, as was said to one anciently, "Thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting?" We may try ourselves by the Rule —the word of truth—and ascertain our moral standing at once. This is the proper time to look—to examine our accounts. Our interests demand it; the interests of our fellow men require it; the Lord commands it, and shall it not be done? The blessings we have enjoyed are many; how have they been improved? Every succeeding year brings us so much nearer our final home. We shall soon reach the goal, and will the race have been run successfully? These are questions which should stir our hearts, and call into requisition every power of our minds, that we may make our calling and election sure. Let us improve upon the past by living more devoted, exerting ourselves more powerfully, and by applying ourselves more assiduously to the study and practice of truth and duty.

The Two-Horned Beast.—No. 8.

(Concluded.)

HAS THE NAPOLEONIC DYNASTY REVIVED?

Mr. Frere, as has been remarked, "has long ago advanced the opinion that Napoleon the First was the seventh head of the beast, and so powerful was his conviction of this fact, that even when Napoleon and his son had both died, Mr. Frere still continued to persist in his opinion and to look forward to the revival of the Napoleonic dynasty."

"As it is right to give every man his due, we must remark (says an English writer) that a more perfect instance of far-reaching sagacity has never been exhibited by any prophetic writer, for after nearly thirty years from the death of Napoleon, and fifteen from the death of his son, a new Napoleon arose and was at once advanced to the government of the French nation." "Napoleon the First waked from his long sleep, and began slowly to revive. First, his great NAME shook off the dust, and floated, like a bird of prey, through the atmosphere of Europe. Next his empire revived, in the person of his nephew." "Napoleon the First being the seventh head, the eighth head ought to be a repetition or revival of the same person; and there is no doubt that the Third Napoleon is a repetition of the First. In name, in family, and in empire, the First Napoleon revived in the person of the Third. Nor does the similarity stop even there. The present Emperor repeats his predecessor in all the minutiæ of his empire, and has made it his avowed object to revive not only the name, but the inmost thoughts of Napoleon First. The aspirations and the projects, suppressed, as if forever, by Leipsic and Waterloo, are called up again from the dust of forty years, and paraded in defiance before the eyes of Europe. It is not IMITATION that is sought for, it is RESURRECTION! Of this, Cherbourg is a prominent instance; for it is openly announced that at Cherbourg the projects of the First Napoleon are to be carried out to their accomplishment. As a memorial of the past, and a manifesto of the future, there is to be graven on the equestrian marble "statue" of Napoleon First, "I will renew at Cherbourg the marvels of Egypt." . . .

The identity of the two heads enables us to apply the same term to the seventh head as the PROTOTYPE of the eighth. The "wild beast" properly is the eighth head in his character as Antichrist. And as if to make the identity of the two heads still more evident, and immediately on the arrival of the Emperor at "the place Napoleon," where stands the new equestrian statue of the Great Napoleon, the veil which covered the statue suddenly fell, amidst cries of "Long live Napoleon First! Long live Napoleon the Third!" Long live a dead man! Yet this is significant. "The beast that was, and is not, and yet is, even he is the eighth and is of (Greek, out of, or from,) the seven, and goeth into perdition."

Brethren, hold on to your shares—no break in God's "cable." What the world calls "Millerism," is not dead; the insulations are getting more perfect, and blessed be God it will soon "SPEAK and not LIE. Though he tarry, wait for him, he will surely come."

"At Waterloo, June 18th, 1815, Napoleon fell, and with him the seventh headship; and the congress of Vienna decreed that no relative or descendant of his should ever again occupy the throne of France." But the counsels of man are little worth against the counsels of God. Accordingly, on the 27th of August, 1848, Louis Napoleon, who, previous to this, had been a wanderer and an exile from his country, but always a firm believer in his great future destiny by that magic influence that attached itself to his name, was elected to the French assembly, and on the 20th of December following, was chosen president of the assembly for three years.

On the 13th of Nov., 1851, he brought about a "coup de main," in which several thousands lost their lives, and on the 24th of the same month, having banished all the chief men that stood in his way, he was elected president of the republic for ten years. This, however, was not sufficient to satisfy his ambitious design, for on the 2d of Dec., 1852, he assumed the old Roman title of Emperor, crying, "The empire is peace."

Here, then, we have the revived seventh head in Napoleon Third, in which "that man of sin," "the son of perdition" (for this eighth head goes into perdition,) the "Antichrist" of the Scriptures of truth will be fully developed.

We shall now give some extracts from a tract entitled, "The days in which we live," by E. W. P. T. In proof that Napoleon III. will in the appointed time become manifest as the Antichrist, he says:—

1. "He is out of or from the seven." Speaking of Rev. 17: 8—the interpretation of which is as follows; under Napoleon I. "the beast that was" under Napoleon II., his son, in whose favor he abdicated, but who never reigned, the beast "is not," and under Napoleon III. the beast "yet is," even he is the eighth and goeth into perdition.

2. The pope at present reigns by the pleasure of Napoleon III. He maintains his authority by the presence of the French soldiers. * * Thus we see that the Emperor of France has virtually been for eight years the ruler of Rome, as his uncle was before him for four years. The influence of the priesthood has been exerted in a thousand ways to raise Napoleon III. to that pitch of power that he now holds, which is the greatest and most absolute in the world.

3. A third reason why we believe Napoleon III. to be the eighth head, is on account of his name. * * Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man, and his number is six hundred three score and six. "The number of a man" signifies the number of a man's name. Now as John described the history of the Roman or Latin [illegible] is but just to suppose that the n[illegible] interpretation of that name would be [illegible] in the Latin language. Hence we [illegible] LODOVICOS, the Latin for Louis, whi[illegible] name exactly comprehends 666.

4. A fourth reason is because the prophet Dan. chap. 2: 45, says, "He shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain." [illegible] many ages the holy places at Jerusalem have been a cause of contention between various nations of Europe and Asia Minor. The crusades, in which it was [illegible] forty millions of lives were lost, were carried on to obtain possession of these localities. When Louis Napoleon became Emperor of France, he took the title of "Defender of the Faith and Protector of the holy places." The keys to the holy sepulchre being about to be given over to Louis, was the occasion which brought about the Crimean war. "At the present time, French influence is entirely upon the ascendancy in Jerusalem, and Louis Napoleon is not only the protector, but also the actual possessor of some of the holy places; for the Sultan has for some time made a grant to him of the church of St. Ann, of which he is now the patron, and by the latest accounts has also given to him a large vacant space of ground, situated upon the most commanding as well as the most beautiful eminence in Jerusalem, upon which spot the Military order of the Hospitaller Knights, founded A. D. 1099, erected a structure for their own use. In all this, we see how the providence of God is preparing the way for Napoleon III. to erect some splendid palace at Jerusalem when the time arrives for his doing so.

5. A fifth reason for fixing this character upon Napoleon III. is on account of the influence and authority he has exercised in the affairs of the various European nations." After speaking at length upon his influence and authority, he remarks;—"The French nation is much gratified with the honors conferred upon their chief. They boast that, within one year, he has met with the Queen of England, the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, the King of Bavaria, the King of Belgium, the King of Wurtemberg, the Queen of Greece, the Prince of Nassau, the Grand Duke of Baden, and the Grand Duke of Saxe Coburg. All these events prove the ascendancy of Napoleon's influence.

6. We see in him the man who was well pleased to listen whilst the Lord's prayer was addressed in paraphrase to himself; the man who has been called "the Savior;" the man who, from the pulpit of Notre Dame in Paris, has been proclaimed a greater than Jesus Christ; the man who, instead of spurning such blasphemy, rewarded its author with a present of a valuable snuff box. The man who is skilled in that refined species of "Pythonism," (Acts 16: 16) called Spiritualism, the modern phase of Satan's "deceivableness of unrighteousness."

Thus we believe that "Spiritualism" will fully develop itself in the "Antichrist," "the man of perdition," the eighth head of the Leopard beast; its characteristics being more fully portrayed in the "Lamb-like" wonder-working "two-horned beast" of Rev. 13: 11. Of its two horns we would say with an English author, "But we wish the reader to consider the vast consequence of this new alliance. France and Russia are evidently in league against Austria and England for every purpose no doubt, but most especially for the dismemberment of Turkey." That France is this eighth head I think must now be apparent to all; but until it shall have developed more fully the power assigned it—until the "two horns," "the image," "the mark," the number and "power" be more fully defined, reason requires that the "third angel's message" should be suspended; for mark you, whoever carries that message, does it at the risk of his life. It is the last "message;" and it is the forty-two month beast and an image to the same, caused to be made by the "two horned beast," that demands reverence. Therefore "if any man worship "the beast," or his "image," or receive his "mark," will be a fearful and final warning, and this we believe is now pending.

But have we nothing to fear in this country? Says Mr. Smith, p. 169, "God grant that it may mean only the old Roman earth;" but again remarks that "the scriptures seem to give a far wider extent to this power, even to the kings of the earth and the whole world." Again he says, "God in mercy grant that the calamities may be no more extensive. But I do not feel satisfied that the prophecies do ... a far wider extent," even to ... body of the christian church."

...ickersteth; "It becomes, then, a ...portant duty for a spiritual watch... not to deceive those for whom he ...ches by speaking smooth things and prophesying deceits, (Is. 30: 10,) but honestly and plainly to warn men of their danger."

Thus have I endeavored thus far to do; yet I have much more to say in connection with this subject in due time. This subject henceforward will be the subject with which the church will be principally engaged. And while some may tremble at thought of approaching danger, the thoughts of "going home," while listening to the voice of the great Shepherd, "Fear not, little flock; fear not them which can kill the body," will soothe all their sorrows, and in the language of Rutherford will cry, "O, sweet Lord Jesus, take wide steps! O my Lord, come over mountains at one stride! ... O that he that feedeth among the lilies would cry to his heavenly trumpeters to make ready, let us go down and fold together the four corners of the world, and marry the bride!" Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

Holiness to the Lord.

Beloved Editor:—The Lord be with you. We rejoice greatly, to see so many things in your weekly on the subject of "holiness to the Lord," the perfect love that casteth out all fear. What more important in this age of rebuke, and perpetual backslidings, than the tongue of fire, the burning coal fresh from God's altar?

How is it possible without this renovating, purifying power from on high, for the cause of God to prosper? Our soul kindles to a flame at the very name of holiness! Angels tune their harps also on this theme. Heaven's arches ring, and will ring as eternity rolls on, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Almighty." Why not, then, begin this song here, even now?

Thank the Lord, there is hope of a more general and simultaneous waking up to this question. Only a few weeks since, on a visit to a place called Birmingham, and beholding what God had wrought, our whole soul burst forth joyfully, "that's it, that's it." That's why the cause of truth prospers so remarkably in B. The doctrine of holiness prevails; entire consecratedness to God is advocated, boldly published from the pulpit in all its vividness, clearness and fullness, and lived out by its professors. "Holiness to the Lord" is the motto—the watchword—meetings for the establishment in this superlative grace are held weekly. What the result? God's spirit is poured out, sinners are awaked, and converted, by scores and hundreds—the revival continues unabatingly, year in, year out—the new converts hold on their way, grow stronger and stronger. Hardly a single instance of blacksliding is recorded. The effect of this publishing a full gospel, a complete Savior—whose blood cleanseth from all sin, even now, is most salutary on the surrounding community—the world see it, feel it. Intemperance, Sabbath desecration, infidelity, and a pro-slavery spirit, begin to hide their deformed heads. This one example ought to convince every one of God's smiling approbation at this course. Friends, ministers of the High and Holy One, what your wish, your heart's desire and prayer to God? that he may be glorified in all things? in the salvation of sinners continually? That revivals on revivals, a general outpouring of God's Holy Spirit may be evermore? That new converts may grow stronger and stronger, shine brighter and brighter ever unto the perfect day? and never backslide? never dishonor their holy profession? In a word, is it your wish, your daily prayer that this world may be speedily renovated, turned upside down, made to blossom as the rose—preach holiness, entire consecration, perfect love, the duty and privilege of every one to love God supremely now, with all the heart, soul and strength—to live for God and only for God. Preach the doctrine, sound it out, bring it home definitely, with power to every heart—make it a definite special object—let sanctification follow justification in quick succession—in every revival, every protracted effort. Preach the doctrine, preach it, practice it, sound it out—God will bless it—it's the essence, the cream—the nectar, the sum and substance of the gospel—the glad news, the joy and song of angels and glorified spirits. "Holiness to the Lord." Never, never will the church arise, shine forth as the morning, "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners," till the Bible is understood and believed on this point. Just in proportion to the advancement of the doctrine of holiness, the purification of God's people, in heart and life, is the prosperity of truth and righteousness in the world, and the falling of Satan as lightning from heaven.

"The love of God flows just as much,
As that of ebbing self subsides,
Our hearts (their scantiness is such)
Bear not the conflict of two rival tides."

In the cause of reform, purity and love,
yours, D. F. Newton, N. Y.,
Ed. "Golden Rule."

The Soul.—No. 12.

We have stated, in former articles, that nephesh, the word rendered soul, is translated in forty-four different ways in the common English Bible. We now purpose to give all these variations, and quote the texts that contain them. Our readers, who wish to be well posted on this subject, will do well to preserve these articles for reference, and mark the passages in their Bibles. It is for this object, in compliance with a request, that we present these facts.

1. Nephesh is rendered man four times. Ex. 12: 16. "And in the first day there shall be an holy convocation, and in the seventh day there shall be an holy convocation to you; no manner of work shall be done in them, save that which every man must eat, that only may be done of you."—Lev. 24: 17. "And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death."—2 Kin. 12: 4. "And Jehovah said ... all the money that every man is set at."—Isa. 49: 7. "Thus saith the Lord ... to him whom man despiseth."

2. Nephesh is (2) rendered men once. 1 Chron. 5: 21. "And they took away their cattle ... and of men an hundred thousand."

"Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu ... against Job ... because he justified himself." Jer. 51: 14. "The Lord of hosts hath sworn by himself."—Amos 2: 14. "Neither shall the mighty deliver himself." Ver. 15. "Neither shall he that rideth the horse deliver himself."—Amos 6: 8. "The Lord hath sworn by himself."—Jonah 4: 8. "Jonah .. wished in himself to die."

5. Nephesh is rendered he twice. Ps. 105: 18. "Whose feet they hurt with fetters; he was laid in iron."—Prov. 16: 26. "He that laboreth, laboreth for himself."

6. Nephesh is rendered me three times. Num. 23: 10. "Let me die the death of the righteous."—Jud. 16: 30. "And Sampson said, let me die with the Philistines." 1 Kin. 20: 32. "Thy servant Benhadad saith, I pray thee, let me live."

Poultney.

We are back again in this interesting field of labor, and doubtless our readers are anxious to know how the work of the Lord is prospering. Well, during our absence of about two weeks, the enemy made an earnest effort in various ways to divert the attention of the people from the great truths of the Bible and quiet all their fears of danger if they continued in the way to destruction. Cold hearted professors, full of sectarianism, did what they could to throw dust in the eyes of the young converts, and seemed to glory most in standing as stumbling blocks in their way. Preachers preached against them, and endeavored to blacken the work of God by their reproachful epithets and sneering contempt, but we found the truth still spreading, and many rejoicing in its reception. O Lord, have mercy on thine opposers.

We met a hearty greeting from the friends of Jesus, and were kindly welcomed by Dea. Joslyn and family to their hospitable home. We found them noble specimens of humanity, holding the pure principles of christianity unadulterated with bigotry and sectarianism. How we love to associate with such disciples of the blessed Jesus. Every comfort in their power to afford was most cheerfully proffered. May the Lord reward them for their labors of love to his unworthy servant.

We commenced our meetings again Saturday evening, Dec. 25th, and though the night was cold, a large congregation was present, that listened with deep attention. At the close five came forward for prayers. We felt, to some extent, the chilling influence of the opposition powers that had been so active during our absence, but the Lord strengthened our faith. Lord's day morning, we had a refreshing love feast, while talking of our blessed Savior. Eleven were baptized in the afternoon, and went on their way rejoicing. Said ... sisters, who was baptized, a young lady who is teaching in the place,—"I ... happy as I can be." She, as ... found the promise true, "Repent and be baptized ... and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." In the evening every part of the house was crowded to its utmost capacity, by an attentive audience. Thirteen came forward for prayers, and several were blessed, and confessed the Savior.

Last evening, Monday 27th, we had a very solemn season. Forty-three came forward for prayers, and some found peace in believing, and spoke of their determination to follow Christ, and seek for immortality "by patient continuance in well doing."

Matt. 11: 12.

A brother wishes to know our opinion on Matt. 11: 12.—"The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force." The marginal reading is, "the kingdom of heaven is gotten by force, and they that thrust men, take it," &c. "The kingdom of heaven," and "the kingdom of God," are used interchangeably in the Bible, meaning the inheritance promised to the saints. "Hearken, my beloved brethren, hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him?" Jas. 2: 5. What kingdom? "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world!" Matt. 25: 34. Who occupied this kingdom first? Adam. In what state is that kingdom now? "They that thrust men" have it in possession; and it is to "be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Lk. 21: 24. "The violent have taken the Lord's kingdom and claimed it as their own, and when the rightful King came, he had no place to lay his head, and was crucified by these violent ones who are yet treading down the kingdom, or territory promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but, thank the L... their "squatter sovereignty" is nearly expired, and soon the "Prince of Peace" will take possession and give the kingdom to "the saints of the Most High;" then violent will no more take it by force, for saints shall "possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever." Dan. 7: 18.

The following extract, from a paper, shows that still "the kingdom of heaven is gotten by force, and they that thrust men take it." Says a gentleman who is now traveling in the East:—

24. It is contrary to all the known operations of the Almighty to torment men eternally. In all cases of suffering, of torment, of punishment in this world, he ever, in some way, reveals an end. In all cases of punishment, too, he observes the following laws: 1st, to punish for the good or warning of others. 2d, to punish for the reformation of the offender punished. But when the wicked are in eternal torment and the good saved, who is to be benefited by the eternal torment of the damned? Would it not be for the good—the benefit of all holy beings to have the poor miserable creatures put out of being and suffering? Again, eternal torment can never benefit the tormented. What then, I ask, can be the object of the Almighty in tormenting them eternally? O do not let us any longer ignore the holy consistency of our God.

25. To make an end of the wicked—a final end—is in perfect keeping with the character of God. The case stands thus: God made man—placed him on trial, in temptation; those who finally overcome sin, through Christ, shall live forever in glory—those who do not, He will burn them up, and thus put them back where He took them from. Then He has done no wrong. The universe is clean, and God, Christ, angels, men, and devils shall say Amen!

EDWIN BURNHAM.

Important Correction.

On page 21 of the "Discussion," Dr. Litch is represented as saying, "Not his spirit; for that went to God," &c. If this was a lapsus linguae, it was the opposite of the thought that was intended to be uttered; and Dr. Litch wishes it corrected, so as to read, "It was his spirit that went to God, to be disposed of," &c. The error is so palpable, that the intelligent reader ...as doubtless judged it to be a mistake; ... it is well to correct it, to avoid useless ...apprehension.—[Ed. Advent Herald.

Believers washed in Blood.

"But ye are washed." 1 Cor. 6: 11.
"By the washing of regeneration." Titus 3: 5.

A thing washed is supposed to be clean; and any thing washed thoroughly and effectually is clean. Believers are washed from all the impurity and stains of sin; but what is most surprising Blood is required as the element in which to cleanse from sin and guilt. Therefore "a fountain" has been "opened for sin and for uncleanness."

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
And sinners plunged beneath that flood,
Lose all their guilty stains."

"Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood." Rev. 1: 5. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." 1 John 1: 7.

The fact in respect to the cleansing power of blood has been discovered, and is made use of by science and art in the clarifying of sugar, &c. Long before this discovery was made by man, however, the Lord declared, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Isa. 1: 8. Jehovah taught the world from the beginning the virtue of "blood" and of "ashes" to cleanse, and to purge the conscience from sins. On every altar, and in every sacrifice slain and consumed, "from the foundation of the world," was written: "Without shedding of blood is no remission." Heb. 9: 22.—"The blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean," could not "take away sins;" nor sanctify to the purifying of the flesh," only as the offering was made in the faith of that ONE and greater and more perfect sacrifice;—"The body of Jesus Christ once for all." And as "the bodies of those beasts, whose blood" was "brought into the sanctuary of the High Priest for sins" were "burned without the camp," so Christ, "who through the Eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God," "suffered without the gate," that there should be "no more offering for sin;" and that "their sins and iniquities" be "remembered no more."

O. R. FASSETT.

☞ 'Twas an unhappy division that has been made between faith and works. Though in my intellect I may divide them just as in the candle I know there is both light and heat; but yet, put out the candle and they are both gone; one remains not without the other; so it is with faith and works.—Selden.

CHRISTIAN MUSINGS.

[This hymn was found in a chest in an English cottage. The author's name is unknown.]

In the still silence of the voiceless night,
When, chased by airy dreams, the slumbers flee,
Whom in the darkness doth my spirit seek,
O God, but thee?

And if there be a weight upon my breast,
Some vague impression of the day foregone,
Scarce knowing what it is, I fly to thee,
And lay it down.

Or if it be the heaviness that comes
In token of anticipated ill,
My bosom takes no heed of what it is,
Since 'tis thy will.

For oh, in spite of past and present care,
Or any thing beside, how joyfully
Passes that almost solitary hour,
My God, with thee!

More tranquil than the stillness of the night,
More peaceful than the silence of that hour,
More blest than any thing, my spirit lies
Beneath thy power.

For what is there on earth that I desire
Of all that it can give or take from me,
Or whom in heaven doth my spirit seek,
O God, but thee?

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 7.

My Dear Sister :—You have no need to feel discouraged because your heart appears to you more vile than before you came to the decision to become a whole offering unto God, and to live entirely devoted unto Him. It is the result of deeper heart-searchings. The "candle of the Lord" is shining within, and discovering to you more clearly your real condition.

Let me illustrate this. Do you see that sunbeam as it shines across the room, through the half-opened shutter? Just observe those particles of dust floating in its light! The sunbeam does not create those motes of dust; it only reveals them to our vision. They as truly exist in the darker parts of the room, though unperceived by us. Open the shutter, and let the room be fully illuminated, and we discover much more impurity than before. It is just so with your heart. It was a ray of divine sunshine penetrating it, that first led you to behold your need of fur- r cleansing; and, as you yielded to the uence of that conviction, God poured flood of light, and you discovered, our astonishment, defilement beyond t you had imagined; and you seem to rself to have become worse instead of tter, since you decided on a more holy and devoted life.

My own experience may encourage you. A year or two after my conversion, I went to the city of B——. Association with the worldly-minded had a tendency to influence my mind, and draw me away from my Savior. I did not relinquish my religious duties, but love no longer prompted me to their performance. I prayed in my closet, but I did not love to pray; I no longer communed with God; worldly thoughts intruded upon my cold and formal devotions, and I was not blest in their performance, for often were they hurriedly performed. Conformity to the world in outward attire soon became manifest. Upon my return home, and attending again upon those meetings that were once so dear, g surrounded by religious associa- ught to be more devoted to God, more active in his service. ime my course was exceedingly At times I would have some and then again I would relapse of unbelief and coldness. I g grace.

g commenced. I was pared to labor for the salvation of souls. My own heart needed to be revived and quickened. I resolved, by God's help, to press my own case at the throne grace, until I could feel and know that fully saved, and that I loved God divided heart. I prayed, "Search Spirit, and let me, in the light of thy rt as it is in thy sight!" my prayer ered. My heart was probed to its very depths, and the view I had of deformity led me almost to despair. Satan tempted powerfully to discouragement. But the thought that God had given me a view of my heart, in order that I might apply to the cleansing fountain, gave strength to my wavering faith, and led me with earnestness to plead my cause before the throne. I labored, I struggled, I importuned, I consecrated, I strove to believe the blessing mine; but all in vain; darker the cloud gathered around me; instead of advancing, I was seemingly receding; and, as effort after effort to break through the darkness, and emerge into the clear sunshine of God's approval, was powerless, I was on the point of yielding the point, and ceasing wholly from the strife.

Before deciding, however, thus to do, I resolved to try just once more. My parents were going to the meeting, and I resolved to stay at home, and make one more desperate effort for liberty. I knelt to pray, resolving to plead long, and with an importunity not to be denied. Judge of my astonishment when I found myself unable to offer a word of prayer! My lips were completely sealed; my case now appeared hopeless, and the enemy told me that it was so, for God would not even permit me to pray. I arose and sat down. All at once the cry burst from my lips, "O, Lord! what is it that prevents my receiving the blessing now? Show me the hindrance!" Immediately the answer came. "You have been trusting too much in your own efforts," said a voice within. I saw it now. Yes! I had been trusting in my earnest pleadings—my heart-felt strivings—my importunate supplications—my strong efforts to believe, and claim the blessing mine. Just then the gentle voice whispered again, "I will pray the Father for you." It is Jesus who speaks. I have tried to pray, and failed. Jesus says, "I will pray for you." My heart said, "Jesus cannot pray in vain. I will trust in him!" My eye was turned heavenward, and I had an inward view of Christ pleading with the Father. As I gazed upon him, and by simple faith reposed on him, I began to feel the virtue of his blood; it flowed upon my heart; it washed out its stains; and then it reflected upon its pure tablet the image upon which I was gazing. Christ was mine! Christ was in my heart! I knew it, and calmly, unaccompanied by any extatic joy, was the inward witness given, causing my lips to utter forth praises to Him who had redeemed me. Surely I was led by a way I knew not. I ceased from my own efforts. I calmly rested all on Him, who said to my soul, "I will pray the Father for you," and was saved!

Not thus may you, my friend, be delivered, for God works in divers ways to bring about the same results. Sometimes Jesus simply touched the eyes of the blind, and they were immediately opened, and sometimes the clay is first put on, removing as it were the light further from the sightless eye-balls; and then the water from Siloam's fountain is applied, ere sight be given. But I would have you remember this; that a deep consciousness of your present unlikeness to God is a preparatory step, and that when you receive the virtue of the cleansing blood, it will be when, ceasing from all reliance on your own works, you trust simply in Christ to save you, and save you now.

Yours in love, M. D. W.

For the Crisis.

To Whom it may Concern.

There seems to be a fault prevailing at quite an extent among ministers at the present, (permit a layman to speak,) that not only is very deleterious to the cause, but is felt in many ways; and that is, when a preacher makes an appointment at a certain place, and fails to fulfill the same. For example: an appointment is given, notices are put up all over town, a hall is engaged, a congregation gathers, waits awhile, returns home disappointed and discouraged, brethren feel the responsibility, and are tried. Perhaps the appointment reads, "Please meet me at such a time and place," &c. A brother starts off in the rain for the depot, a distance of two or three miles, returns alone, keeps up courage, however, and is certain he will come on the last train; goes as before and returns the same; but this is not all of his burden; a hall has been engaged, and it now remains for him to go and see the owner, so as not to have it warmed and lighted, a distance of two miles, making in all about sixteen miles. Now if this man is not without a degree of causality, he will not fail by this time to think, why all this confusion? Rather serious thoughts will arise, but will soon be driven away, is charitable, and thinks sickness has detained. But when he learns soon the whole cause was because it looked or some other frivolous excuse, his feelings! Shame on such courage! called into the vineyard thus d?

Future Exaltation of the Resurrected Worthy.

"Neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke 20: 36.

The Greek and Hebrew word messenger, translated angel, sometimes refers to earthly and sometimes to celestial beings, either good or evil; (see 2 Sam. 2: 5; James 2: 25; Mark 1: 2; Mal. 3: 1,) but many times to an order of intelligences of heavenly origin, very far superior to that of men. See Gen. 18th and 19th chaps., also Matt. 28; Ps. 103: 20. These proof texts will suffice on this point.

Our wise Heavenly Father has proffered to the overcomer, in this soul trying probationary state, most exalted benefits in the coming world. These favors not only pertain to our locality and associations, but some of them to our own personality; and have special regard to a bodily transformation, or regeneration, (not annihilation and new creation.) Of this new moulding of himself, every thinking christian realizes the need; for he well knows that if we were to be placed in a Valparasio with the purest associations, some of us would perpetually groan with physical disease, some mentally deranged by much sorrow of heart, some as covetous as the very embodiment of selfishness can be, and at the same time profess to love truth's advancement more than every thing else, and others gratifying the lowest of all the animal propensities to their own utter and eternal ruin. This most desirable change is promised on God's veracity recorded in 1 Cor. 15: 8, also in our text, without which the very fifth kingdom itself would not be very heavenly.

Now as it is very natural for us, as well as for Peter, to inquire, "What shall we have?" we will contemplate our future prospects equal to angelic existence, for our own present encouragement or conviction, as the case may require. We shall die no more! How wonderful the change which will exempt us from the ravages of disease and death. The past six thousand years afford but two instances of this, out of the millions of living creatures who have become earth's denizens. Hydra-headed, ravenous death always follows in our wake wherever we go, and we have no ability to resist him; and we well know that the insatiate monster will not be satisfied, gluttonous as his life has ever been, until the last appointed victim has been slain by his cruel power. But in the resurrected state the worthy are to be ransomed from this tyrant's sway.

2. Our locomotive powers will be increased to an amazing velocity. See Dan. 9. While Daniel was offering a short petition to the heavenly Majesty, before the request was all articulated, Gabriel, being commissioned to fly quickly, appeared in the presence of the man greatly beloved; and in his communication with Mary, he declares that his residence is in the presence of God. Before such speed the motion of the swiftest wind, the rapidity of light, the agility of lightning, fall into comparative insignificance; but swift as thought angelic bodies make their exit to earth. Can it be that we, poor crawling snails, shall ever have such celerity as this? So the promise reads.

3. We shall be potent as they. Mark the one who smote Herod unto death because he gave not God the glory. Another rolled away the ponderous stone at the door of the sepulchre, and then quietly seated himself thereon. Such was his overpowering appearance, that the watch became as dead men at the sight. Another slays all the first born in populous Egypt in one night; and still another slays 185,000 of Assyria's defiant host, in the nocturnal shade, utterly unperceived, so quietly was it done, until the dawn of the following day. Such exhibitions of strength as far exceed that of Sampson's, as his does the merest worm.

4. Our intellectual capacity will be proportionally expanded, for we are to be equal to the angels. What examples have we of their expanded mental development? We will note a few instances. There is one called the wonderful numberer, or the numberer of secrets. An instructor of this nature gave Daniel a prophetic history of the world from his day down to the first and second advent of Messiah, in the rule of a multitude of emperors and kings; covering a space of more than 2000 years. I think a more comprehensive prophecy never was uttered in so few words.

About the year 96, A. D., the beloved John was instructed in the then important future events connected with the church and the world, the persecution of Christ's flock and the beastly power that should do it; the rise and spread of Mohammedanism; the pouring out of the vials of God's wrath, the deliverance of his church, and her ultimate glory in the kingdom of God, or the new earth state, in such a glowing description of magnificence and splendor as was never on any other occasion given to man. All this was done by an angel.

5. They have almost incomprehensible acuteness of vision, for in whatever part of the earth they have been sent, or to whatever person commissioned, we have no account of tardiness in obtaining the desired object, for the reason that the residence of the individual was not fully known; on the contrary, the exact locality of Lot in Sodom; of Hagar under the tree in the wilderness; of Elijah by the brook; the place where to obtain the needed bread and water for his sustenance; of Abraham's tent; of Daniel in the lion's den, as well as when he was engaged in prayer for his people; the abode of Elizabeth and Mary before the birth of John and Jesus; also the stable containing the infant Redeemer; the death of Herod the infanticide; the whereabouts of Christ when in the wilderness of temptation; the garden of sorrow; the situation of Joseph's tomb; of the prison which held Peter; the journeying of Saul to Damascus; the banishment of John on the Isle of Patmos. These instances seem to teach that they can survey every portion of the earth much more acutely than we can an inferior town; that their individuality never, in a single instance, causes a mistake in designating personages, but the errand is always done to the proper person, and in a correct manner. Who! Oh, who of Adam's fallen race shall attain to such equality? Human aspect and incredulity answer in lamentable accents, None! They are all lost—shall all perish like the beast. But assurance by faith says, some shall be thus lifted up; but they are not the rejecters of Christ, the discarders of Revelation, the unrepented transgressor, the half persuaded looker on, the dormant professor who is always wishing to do good in the world, but with abundant means in his hands, and many a poor, worthy one in his sight, does nothing; not that covetous, narrow minded, mistaken soul, who never denied himself one single gratification for the sake of the promulgation of Christ's cause, or the proclamation of his word, but who would rather the preacher should live in penury, on the account of continued unrequited toil, wear his thread bare garments, tear himself from his home and family, when he knows not on what they will subsist in his absence; they had rather see the truth become utterly extinct, even in their own immediate locality, than bear one fiftieth part of the preacher's burdens. Lord, have mercy on such before their riches eat as doth a canker.

Who then shall be found worthy? Those whose hearts are in unison with the benevolent Savior; whose faith is known by their works; who follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; who patiently endure unto the end; who overcome evil with good; who deny themselves of all ungodliness and worldly lust; who conquer the lusts of the flesh; who pray, "Lead me not into temptation," and try to keep from it; in short, it is or will be, those who are purified, made white and tried.

The Lord adapt his grace to both reader and writer, that we may escape the corruptions that are in the world, and be recipients of the inheritance promised to the meek of the earth, and have the rich boon of our great Father conferred on our unworthy selves, of equality with the heavenly hosts, who now, with the utmost pleasure, do his will, and with adoration bow before his throne and worship both Father and the ever blessed Son, to whom be glory both now and ever more.

THE CONVERTED MEDIUM.

Dr. Randolph, the heretofore guished Spiritual Medium, preached sermon on Sunday, Nov. 21st, in Clinto Hall, from the text:

"For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." (Greek—Against the spirits of wickedness in aerial regions.)

As Dr. Randolph's prominence, in the early days of Spiritualism, renders his recantation a matter of considerable importance, we reproduce, in his own words, the more significant passages of his discourse. It is necessary to state that Dr. Randolph is a man of extraordinary intellectual activity, is of the Roanoke stock, and has Indian and African as well as Caucasian blood in his veins.

"For nearly ten years have I been seeking rest for my weary soul. But rest came not until I sought it earnestly at the family altar, surrounded by those whom, in the delirium of mad philosophy, I thought were not for me, but whom I subsequently found dearer, nearer, truer than all the world beside. * * * *

Spiritualism is all eye and head; no soul and heart; all intellect, no emotions; all philosophy, no religion; all spirit, no God! And even the social reformatory movement has dwindled down into prostitutional nurseries!

I enter the arena as the champion of common sense, against what in my soul I believe to be the most tremendous enemy of God, morals and religion, that ever found foothold on the earth—the most seductive, hence most dangerous, form of sensualism that ever cursed a nation, age or people.

I was a medium about eight years, during which time I made three thousand speeches, and traveled over several different countries, proclaiming the new Gospel. I now regret that so much excellent breath was wasted, and that my health of mind and body was well nigh ruined. I have only begun to regain both since I totally abandoned it, and to-day had rather see the cholera in my house than be a Spiritual medium! * * * * *

After embracing Harmonial Philosophy, (and my experience is that of thousands,) I sought to be a medium—made experiments, and obtained my wish. Better had I found my grave! The rapping and other phenomena followed me, produced, as I then thought, by good human spirits.—These were soon succeeded by the trance condition, to which I became subject, and the moment I yielded to that seductive in fluence, I ceased to be a man, and beca a mere automaton, at the mercy of a p I believed to be demoniac, but which ers accept as Progressive-Spiritu which they cannot prove to be such they may. DIRGE FOR THE OLD YEAR.

Another short year like a thought has flown by,
And mixed with eternity's wave;
Yet its every hour had its tear and its sigh,
Which chilled the glad heart and bedimmed the bright eye,
When a loved one was laid in the grave.

To many its dawn seemed an omen of bliss,
And sorrow was known but by name;
Yet many a lip which glowed warm with love's kiss,
Is mouldering with worms in decay long ere this,
Like a ruin all crumbling in flame.

And many, once wealthy, cold charity seek,
Forlorn and oppressed with deep care,
While round their forms shivering, the keen winds blow bleak,
Pinch and stiffen the features, and give to the cheek
The ghastly pale hue of despair.

The husband, whose wife was his joy and his pride,
Now mourns in his desolate halls,
Nor cares he for aught since his dear Mary died,
But the time when he'll rest in sweet peace by her side,
Where no sorrow or danger appalls.

And the wife, all arrayed in sad widowhood's weeds,
Leads her orphans to weep o'er the tomb
Where their father is laid; and her yearning heart bleeds
When she thinks on his love, and his many kind deeds,
And her heart is all shrouded in gloom.

And the mother has laid in the grave her first-born,
And sprinkled the clods with her tears,
And she hugs the deep grief to her heart so forlorn,
While her bosom with woe is all mangled and torn,
For no comfort to her yet appears.

And children bewail for a fond mother gone,
Who has long been their guardian and friend;
And they weep, and they hope, though they now feel alone,
For a day which is rushing so speedily on,
That shall bring them a joy without end.

Hail day of the Lamb! of the first resurrection,
When those who have slept in the Lord shall arise,
When peace unalloyed takes the place of dejection,
And all the dear objects of our best affection
Forever shall gladden our eyes.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 8.

My Dear Sister:—In reply to your inquiry, "Do you believe it is possible to be made free from sin, and to live without committing sin in this life?" I can most heartily say, I do; and if I did not thus believe, I should want to know, with "Billy Hibbard," just how much sin was actually needful to keep one alive; for I am sure I should want just as little as was necessary. I do not for a moment believe that sin is essential to preserve either health or life. Perhaps you have not examined this subject so fully as I have, and we will, if you have no objections, look over the good old Bible a little while, and see if that teaches the doctrine of holiness, a word that is a bug-bear to some.

Well, we find on the very first page of the history of our Savior, that the angel of God declares that his name must be called Jesus, and gives as a reason; "for he shall save his people from their sins." Here is a positive declaration that "he shall save his people from their sins." But will he save them from all their sins? Turn to 1 John 1: 7. "The blood of Jesus Christ . . cleanseth us from all sin." This plainly teaches that Jesus saves his people—those "who walk in the light," from all their sins; his blood cleanseth them "from all unrighteousness." Read the 9th verse, and you will see that the apostle teaches not only the pardon of past offences, but also the cleansing of the heart from its pollution, and from all of it; and if it is all cleansed away, how much think you remains? Some, however, turn aside from these positive declarations, and quote the 8th verse of this same chapter, as proof that no one can possibly be made free from sin in this life; but, I ask, would the apostle in the same moment declare positively that those who walked in the light, were cleansed from all sin, and also that if any professed to be made free from sin, they were deceived? He would certainly be most inconsistent with himself to make two such opposite statements respecting the same class of individuals.

The sentiment taught by the apostle in the 8th verse is evidently the same as that taught in the 10th verse. Christ is presented before us as the only sacrifice that can take away sins, and of him it is affirmed, that he has power to pardon our offences, and cleanse us from our sinfulness. But if we declare that we need not this sacrifice, that we have not sinned, and therefore need no pardon, we make God a liar, who hath declared that "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," and therefore need a Savior who is able to justify the transgressor, and redeem his soul from its pollution.

The individual who thus professes to have no sin to be pardoned, deceives his own heart, and remains subject to the penalty due to the sinner; but he who acknowledges himself a transgressor of the divine law, and confesses his sins to God, finds that He is faithful and just to forgive him his sins, and to cleanse him from all unrighteousness; and he who denies this truth, makes God a liar, for he believeth not the record that He hath given of his Son. "These things I write unto you," says John, "that ye sin not." But, he adds, "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins."

Why would the apostle write those truths respecting the efficacy of the atoning blood, in order that those to whom he wrote might not sin, if it were impossible for them to refrain from sinning? Lest they, however, be discouraged, and cast away their confidence, if through inexperience, unwatch- [illegible] were overcome by sin, he points them to Christ as their advocate, and sets him forth as the atoning sacrifice for their sins.

In the 3d chapter, the apostle defines sin to be "the transgression of the law," and adds, "And ye know that he (Christ) was manifested to take away our sins, and in him is no sin. Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not." Does not the apostle most positively teach the doctrine of holiness—of freedom from transgression, in these texts? I think there ought to be a distinction kept up between "the transgression of the law," which "is sin," and the "unrighteousness" which results from the transgression. The one is active, and the other passive. The individual who murders another, transgresses the law, he sins, and in consequence of that action, his soul is defiled. There is also a native depravity, that incites to sin. That depravity in itself does not transgress the law, but it leads the individual to transgress, unless resisted and overcome.

The forgiveness of actual transgression is one thing, and the cleansing of the heart from this native depravity, this inherent unrighteousness, increased and strengthened by transgression, is another. For both the blood of Jesus affords a remedy. How is the former obtained? By confession of sin. This every awakened penitent sinner is led by the Spirit of God to do. It is for pardon he seeks—justifying grace. How is the latter received? By walking in the light. "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another (i. e., with God) and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all unrighteousness." After the soul has been pardoned, conviction is given for a deeper work of grace. The individual beholds corruption still within—there is a tendency to sin, against which he has constantly to contend, and by which he is frequently brought under condemnation. If he walks in the light, he will be led to Christ for purity of heart, as he was for the pardon of his sin, though not as now, with the confession of sins committed. It is not for pardon, but for sanctifying grace, that he is now convicted, and when obtained, the heart becomes the temple of the Holy Ghost; and filled with that love which casteth out fear, he goes on his way rejoicing.

But my full sheet admonishes me to close, and we will examine this subject further in my next.

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

Baptism Historically Considered.

BY P. B. MORGAN.

The expressions,—"baptized of Him in the river of Jordan," "and straightway coming up out of the water, He saw the heavens opened;" (Mark 1: 5, 10.) "And John also was baptising in Ænon near to Salim because there was much water there;" (John 3: 23,) "They went down both into the water, both Philip and the Eunuch, and he baptized him; and when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip," (Acts 8: 38, 39,) "Buried with Him by baptism"—"PLANTED together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection." Rom. 6: 4, 5,—with many other similar expressions, certainly seem to form a cogent argument for immersion as THE baptism of the New Testament. And when added to this, first, the fact that such is the primary meaning of the word; second, that in no classical work is the word used otherwise when its literal sense is expressed; and third, that from Matthew to the Apocalypse there is no indication that either there ever was, or ever could be, a person baptized by aspersion—except it may be contended that such was the fact of the children of Israel in passing through the Red Sea, who were however immersed or buried by the cloud to all intents and purposes—and we feel our argument in favor of baptism by immersion only, is very nearly complete.

But to this scriptural and philological argument [illegible] argument that may be adduced to settle this controversy, namely—the voice of the Church. That baptism may be administered by aspersion, sprinkling or pouring, and that as properly to unconscious infants as to believing adults, is contended not only by Papists, but by a large and respectable portion of Protestants. Now if this has been the belief and practice from the beginning, then, as all will concede, an important point has been gained; and if it be so, then may we expect the fact to be made apparent. But if, on the contrary, from the most erudite and unimpeachable christian writers of nearly every age, the testimony be in favor of immersion only, and against aspersion as a modern innovation,—a novelty,—then surely we have gained much in favor of our own position—that immersion is the only baptism of the New Testament.

Ignatius, of A. D. 100 says: "Baptism ought to be accompanied with faith, love, and patience, after preaching." Although this witness is rather meagre, it is however as a testimony against pseudo or infant baptism.

Cyprian, of A. D. 220, was written to concerning the case of one Novatian, who, as it seems, had been sick nigh unto death; becoming greatly alarmed in the prospect of death, he requested baptism; but being too feeble to be carried to the baptismal font, had water poured around him in bed. Upon recovering his health, he proposed to be ordained to the ministry, whereupon the question arose whether one thus "poured upon" could be considered a christian. Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was written to concerning the question, and replied that though this was not baptism, for it is not called baptism, but perichism (perichutheis from peri, around, and cher, to pour,) yet he considered it a valid substitute. Upon this question we have to ask,—if baptism was administered by any means save by immersion, why was Cyprian written to concerning the case of Novatian? And again, if "pouring" was or could be made baptism, why does Cyprian term it a valid substitute?

To this testimony of Cyprian's we have to add as proof positive that baptism at this time was administered only by immersion—the fact that the monks of Cressy wrote to Pope Stephen II. A. D. 754, asking, "If it be lawful in case of necessity, occasioned by sickness, to baptise an infant by pouring water on its head from a cup, or the hands?" To which the Pope replied: "Such a baptism, performed in such a case of necessity, shall be accounted valid." "This," says Basnage, "is accounted the first law against immersion. The Pontiff, however, did not dispense with immersion except in case of extreme necessity. This law, therefore, did not change the mode of dipping in the public baptisms; and it was not till five hundred and fifty-seven years, that the legislature, in a council in Ravenna, 1311, declared immersion and pouring indifferent."

It may be proper to notice at this point what the historian says was "the first undoubted allusion to the baptism of children, which is recorded in the annals of Church history."

Tertullian, of A. D. 200, was written to by a wealthy lady named Quintilla, concerning children being baptized. It seems she had spoken of the Eunuch baptized by Philip, and of the Lord's saying, "suffer little children to come unto me," to which Tertullian replies:—"If Philip baptized the Eunuch on the spot, let us remember it was done under the immediate direction of the Lord. The Eunuch was a BELIEVER of the Scripture; the instruction given by Philip was seasonable; the one preached, the other perceived the Lord Jesus and believed on him. Water was at hand, and the apostle having finished the affair, was caught away." Of suffering little children, he says:—"The Lord does indeed say forbid them not to come unto me; and let them come while they are growing up; let them come and learn, and let them be instructed when they come; and when they understand christianity, let them profess themselves [illegible] of baptism, because fasting, confession of sins, prayer, profession, renouncing the devil and his works are required of the baptized."

A. D. 257, Cyprian was written to by one Fridus, asking how soon after birth it was proper to baptize? Upon which a council of sixty-seven Bishops of North Africa was assembled, who gave it as their opinion that the "grace of God should not be withheld from any son of man, and that a child might be kissed with the kiss of charity as a brother so soon as it is born." About A. D. 380, Gregory, Bishop of Constantinople, gave his opinion on the subject. He says; "But some say what is your opinion of infants who are not capable of judging either of the grace of baptism, or of the damage sustained by want of it? Shall we baptize them too? By all means if there be any apparent danger; for it were better they were sanctified without knowing it, than that they should die without being sealed and initiated. As for others, I give my opinion that when they are three years of age or thereabouts (for then they are able to hear and answer some of the mystical words; and although they do not fully understand, they may receive impressions,) they may be sanctified, both soul and body, by the great mystery of initiation."

With all these efforts to introduce the baptism of infants, Dr. Wall says:—"Complaints were common that mothers could not be prevailed on to put their children into the water at baptism."

In Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, Vol. 2, p. 287, he says:—"Infant baptism was established neither by Christ nor his apostles. In all places where we find the necessity of baptism notified, either in a dogmatic or historical point of view, it is evident that it was only meant for those who were capable of comprehending the word preached, and of being converted to Christ by an act of their own will. A pretty sure testimony of its non-existence in the days of the apostles, may be inferred from 1 Cor. 7: 14, since Paul would certainly have referred to the baptism of infants for their holiness; but even in later days several teachers of the church, such as Tertullian (De Bap.) and others, reject this custom. Indeed his church in general (that of North Africa,) adhered longer than others to the primitive regulations. Even when the baptism of infants was already theoretically derived from the apostles, its practice was nevertheless for a long time confined to mature age."

In A. D. 370, we have the first historical account of the baptism of an infant. "The son of the Emperor Vallens was thought to be dying and was baptized by he command of his majesty, who swore he would not be contradicted." But mark, this was not what we are wont to now call an infant, but a lad six years old.

In the beginning of the fifth century another council was assembled, when it was deemed that "Infants ought to be baptized for the remission of sins, and that all who denied this doctrine should be accursed." St. Paul had said there should come those "having the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such (he commanded) turn away." (2 Tim. :3 5.) And like the Lutheran, Episcopal, and many others of modern times, many churches now felt it time to protest against, and turn away from that terrible power just about to envelop itself as the "man of sin" (2 Thess. 2,)—the Papacy—which should "deceive if it were possible the very elect." These churches were subsequently known as Donatists, Novatianists, Cathari or Puritans, Paulicans, Henricans, Petrobrusians, Menonites, Albigenses, Waldenses, &c. The decree, "that whosoever denies that little children by baptism are freed from perdition and eternally saved, that they be accursed;" was confirmed by the Pope A. D. 418. Note: "By this law," says Gibbon, "three hundred bishops, and several thousand of the inferior clergy, were torn from their churches, stripped of their ecclesiastical possessions, and banished to the islands."

Query: If the baptism of infants was derived from Apostolic practice, [illegible] of a corrupt papacy, with aid of the civil power, while it should be so unceasingly and strenuously protested against by martyrs? When this persecution commenced, the churches are said to have reproached Augustine with the martyrdom of their pastors; to which Augustine replied:—"Martyrs! I know nothing about your martyrs. Martyrs indeed! Martyrs to the devil! There are no martyrs out of the church." Meaning out of the Papal church.

But let us notice the testimony of the learned standard writers who have since made special and critical inquiry concerning this point.

The learned Curcellus says:—"Infant baptism was not known in the world the first two centuries after Christ. In the third and fourth it was approved by few, but at length in the fifth it began to obtain in divers places; and therefore we Pedobaptists* observe this rite indeed as an ancient custom, but not as an apostolic institution. The custom of baptizing infants did not begin before the third century after Christ, and there appears not the least footstep of it for the first two centuries."

Olshausen, a learned and distinguished commentator, says—though himself a Pedobaptist—"There is altogether wanting any conclusive proof passage for the baptism of children in the age of the Apostles, nor can the necessity of it be adduced from the nature of baptism."

Limbroch, a distinguished professor of theology and author of a "System of Divinity," says:—"The necessity of infant baptism was never asserted by any council before that of Carthage, held A. D. 418. We own that there is no example nor undoubted precept in Scripture of infant baptism."

Dr. J. L. Mosheim, Chancellor of the University of Gottingen, has written one of the most justly celebrated histories of the Church ever produced. Himself a Lutheran and of course a Pedobaptist, says: "No persons were admitted to baptism but such as had been previously instructed into the principal points of christianity, and had also given satisfactory proof of pious dispositions and upright intentions." This of course precluded infants. Of the second century he says: "The sacrament of baptism was, during this century, administered publicly twice a year at the festivals of Easter and Whitsuntide. The persons to be baptized, after they had repeated the creed, confessed and renounced their sins, particularly the devil and his pompous allurements, were immersed under water, and received into Christ's kingdom by a solemn invocation."

Neander, whose History of the Church is equally celebrated, says: "Baptism was administered at first only to adults, as men were accustomed to conceive of baptism and faith as strictly connected. We have all reason for not deriving infant baptism from Apostolic institution, and the recognition of it (which followed somewhat later) as an Apostolic tradition, serves to confirm this hypothesis." Elsewhere he says,—"It is certain that Christ did not ordain infant baptism."

Martin Luther says,—"It cannot be proved that infant baptism was instituted by Christ, or by the first christians after the apostles."

Erasmus, the English reformer, says of Rom. 6: 14,—"The Apostle does not seem to treat of infants. It was not the custom for infants to be baptized."

Bishop Burnet says,—"There is no express precept or rule given in the New Testament for the baptism of infants."

Richard Baxter says,—"I conclude that all the examples of baptism in the Scriptures do mention only the administration of it to the possessors of saving faith; and the precepts give no other direction."

Dr. Wall, one of the most noted defenders of infant baptism, admits that "among all the persons that are recorded as baptized by the Apostles, there is no express mention of any infants."

[illegible] North British Review, says,—"The baptismal service of the English [illegible] ded upon Scripture, but its appl[illegible] unconscious infants is destitute of any express Scriptural warrant. Scripture knows nothing of the baptism of infants."

Prof. Moses Stuart says,—"Commands, or plain and certain examples relative to it in the New Testament, I do not find."

Dr. Miller, of Princeton Theological Seminary, says,—"The fact is that during the whole three-score years after the ascension of Christ, which is embraced in the New Testament history, we have no hint of the baptism of infants born of christian parents." Note: Dr. Miller is a Presbyterian theologian, and is an ardent and noted advocate of infant baptism.

Dr. F. A. Cox, as quoted beforehand, says,—"Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, Tatian, Miracian, Felix, Irœneus, and Clement of Alexandria, constitute the christian writers of this second century, who so far from directly speaking of infant baptism, never one utter a syllable upon the subject."

John Calvin says,—"It is nowhere expressed by the Evangelists that any one infant was baptized."

Ludovicus Vives, of great historical note, says,—"None of old was wont to be baptized but in grown age, and who desired it and understood what it was."

(To be concluded.)

* Those who hold to infant baptism.

The World.—Oh! you that dote upon the world, for what victory do you fight? Your hopes can be crowned with no greater reward than the world can give; and what is the world but a brittle thing full of dangers, wherein we travel from lesser to greater perils? Oh! let all her vain, light, momentary glory perish with herself, and let us be conversant with more eternal things. Alas! this world is miserable; life is short, and death is sure.—St. Augustine.

☞ The Christian's fellowship with God is rather a habit than a rapture. He is a pilgrim who has the habit of looking forward to the light before him; he has the habit of not looking back; he has the habit of walking steadily in the way whatever be the weather, and whatever the road. These are his habits, and the Lord of the way is his Guide, Protector and Friend.—Cecil.

For the Crisis.

Fishing with Large Hooks and Nets.

Most men want to do great things when they go fishing. Thinking good fish lie in deep water, they take a large net with great meshes and toil all day and night and get next to nothing. If perchance the net goes around him, he is an old one, and has the skill of getting over or under, even if the net has no hole in it. Sometimes the bed of the river is uneven, and the lead-line of course is up from the bottom in places, and out the big fish goes. At other times I have seen them jump the cork line, and show themselves to be large, out of the net and free. Did not get him by toiling with the big net. Try again. Put more lead on the line, get a man with a boat on the outside with a harpoon to kill him if he tries to jump over it. With all this ingenuity and expense and hard labor they get him, and a great shout is raised among the fishermen. But on inquiring his value in market, the kind must be known, and his name is found to be shark or sturgeon. The prices vary. Some are hardly worth dressing.

I recollect a number of years ago being engaged in fishing with a company where something like the above took place. A great fish was seen, and much anxiety to catch him. A great effort made with a large net. In the heat of their ambition there came along a party of strangers, two poor looking old men and two boys, with a small net, asking the privilege to fish on their ground, which was granted, not thinking the little net would do any thing in fishing there. They told them that they might go behind their big net, which they did. The big one came in empty; the meshes being so large, all common sized fish went through, of which the little net took in abundance. The trial was repeated with the same result. Now a fish caucus must be held to investigate this matter. The big net had caught nothing. The little net had got over $20 worth. This could not be put up with any how. The small net must quit the diggins. If we can't catch, we don't want to be aggravated by seeing that little net beating us. But some of the big net company proposed to try it again. The big net got around the big fish this time, and a shout of victory arose. Signs of good luck appeared. The little net was a little thing in their eye. Soon, however, the shoresmen cried out, "He has gone through the net, he has gone through the net!" A sad madness was pictured on their countenances. While the little company behind, not over anxious, cried out, "Your big fish are in our net." "Blessed be the little net," said one. Another wanted to help draw in the little net. Another cried, "It is our fish, you are on our ground," &c. But the old men kept cool and drew the lead line low, while the boys held the cork line up. The big fish came in with a multitude of valuable small ones. The big company claimed the big fish, which proved to be a sturgeon, worth little or nothing, which was given up willingly, the little company well satisfied with their sport.

I knew of two men starting on a fishing trip. One was a gentleman with his fashionable poles and lines, and blacked boots, the other barefoot and with a little old alder pole and a small hook. The gentleman had much sport laughing at his inferior until they commenced fishing. The gentleman, with his patent fishing tackle, kept twitching and losing his bait, while the old alder pole man drew out one every time. This made the dandy feel worse, and finally went to swearing and threw his patent pole into the water, provoked with every thing and everybody, fish and all. While he was winding up the line on his patent reel, swearing every other word, the alder pole man had caught a fine string and came up and showed his fish, and seemed sorry for his friend's bad luck, and wanted to see his hook. He showed it. The alder pole man told him his hook was too big, the fish could not swallow it. The secret was revealed now why he had so many nibbles, lost his bait and patience, and caught nothing. His hook was too big for common fish, and it was just night, and too late in the day to try the small hook, and he went home with fishermen's luck, tired and hungry; while the alder pole man, calculated for the business, went home rejoicing.

Now, brethren, this comparison or parable you can apply where it belongs. You will see many places where it can fit. Don't try the expensive experiment of the big net or hook, but be satisfied with going out into the highways and hedges, old school-houses, farmers' kitchens, among the poor. God seems to bless this course more than efforts in large places. To catch great men, scatter out with your small nets and hooks, and God will bless your efforts. HIRAM MUNGER.

"Doctrine of a Future Life."

The writer of the following letter is the "Young Minister" to whom, in the year 1841, John Foster addressed his noted restorationist letter. It will be recollected by some of our readers that Foster made allusion to the literal interpretation of the Scriptural terms "death," "destruction," etc., as a view with which he had little acquaintance, and that Mr. W. afterwards embraced this view, and has supported it in his "Life in Christ." The present letter acknowledges the receipt of a copy of "Debt and Grace."—H.

MY DEAR SIR:—I have recently received a copy of your work on Future Life, and beg you to accept my warmest thanks for the noble gift. Up till this time there has been too much reason to lament the 'unlearned and ignorant' quality of much that has been put forth in America on our side of the subject; but I think you have now treated it in a manner which must command the attention of scholars on both shores of the Atlantic. I truly congratulate you on having been enabled to render this signal service to the cause of that which seems to be important truth. You may depend on my steady endeavors to make the book known.

. . . "Opinion in England is undergoing great but steady change in the best quarters. Treatment of persons with us is a striking indication of the progress of principles. I am the only person who openly preaches this doctrine in London, so far as I know. Seven years ago I was shunned and feared. Now I am on terms of exchange with many of the leading ministers in town. I belong to a society of ministers meeting monthly, to which belong Newman Hall, J. C. Harrison, Samuel Morton, Spence of the Poultney Chapel, and others equally well respected; and at our meeting next week we are to discuss this subject. I know well enough that many of them will maintain ignorance—or some kind of second probation, or else agree with me. All this is a great change from ten years ago.

"At the same time it is proper to add that there is no such thing in England as earnest theological discussion in public, on any subject except matters relating to the church and the sacraments. We need an earthquake. . . Yours most truly,

EDWARD WHITE."

The Late Discussion

BETWEEN DR. J. LITCH AND ELD. M. GRANT.

Having received this work and carefully read it, I wish to say, it is the most candid and clear exhibition of the two views argued I have ever met with in a discussion. I have read and heard many during the last twenty years. I trust it will do much in advancing the truth in the minds of those who seek it. I hope it will have a wide circulation, and be carefully read by millions. Let brethren who can do so, put it in the hands of all their reading and thinking friends. I regret that it could not come cheaper. It would have been well to have stated on the cover the cost of reporting, that persons might know why it could not come cheaper. My experience teaches me that about three fourths of the people do not consider the different circumstances by which books come into existence. I shall try to purchase and circulate what I can of them.

Watch Meeting at Poultney.

The first I ever attended, and a meeting of uncommon interest, so much so that I think your readers would rejoice to hear some of the particulars connected with it. We have passed through a long moral winter, cold indeed, but the good Lord has seen fit to revive his work among us, and send us a delightful spring-time and harvest, not indeed as we would have had it, but in his own way.

A few weeks since, Elder Grant came among us, in compliance with the request of several citizens of the place not connected with any religious body, and commenced a series of meetings in Union Hall, formerly known as the "Old Stone Church." It was soon evident that his preaching was producing deep feeling upon religious subjects, and though his doctrine to most of us was new and startling, his practical religion was of the Bible stamp, and commended itself to every man's conscience. In the course of a few evenings, some were persuaded to give themselves to Christ, backsliders were reclaimed, and many sinners were converted, and as yet there is no abatement of interest.

The watch-meeting commenced at 6 1-4 o'clock, and continued without intermission till 1859. We had an interesting prayer meeting until 7 o'clock, when Elder Batchelor, from Pownal, Vt., (who stopped for the night on his way home from the North,) entertained us with a sermon well calculated to arouse the people to holy living. At the close of the discourse, we commenced our social meeting, which continued through the year. Between thirty and forty desired prayers, and several found peace in believing. We think none who attended that meeting will ever forget it.

It has been said by many to be the best meeting they ever attended. The hall was crowded from commencement to close. It is believed that considerable more than one hundred spoke of their determination to be faithful christians. One aged brother said that when the apostles went forth to preach the gospel, they were accused of "turning the world upside down," and for his part he was glad the Lord had sent a man among us to turn Poultney right side up. At the close of the meeting, quite a number signified (by rising) a wish to speak of the goodness of God to them, who had found no opportunity.

It was intended to have two sermons, but the interest was such in the social meeting that no place was found for the second. The closing scene was thrillingly solemn, and was characterized by deep heart-searching, and I trust with many, an entire consecration to the Lord. Although our meeting was about six hours in length, we felt the time too short. However, we parted rejoicing in the Lord, favored with many wishes for "a happy New Year," enjoying a consciousness that they were fully realized, and feeling determined, by the grace of God, to live so that we can "rejoice evermore."

Leaves from my Memorandum.

I left home Nov. 12th for Cleaveland, Le Seuer Co., traveled on foot twenty-seven miles, found a pilgrim home over night with Bro. Hall at Ottawa, formerly of Wisconsin. The 13th arrived at Cleaveland; 14th held a meeting only. Nine out. The traveling very bad. Spoke from the words, "What is truth?" Good attention. We commenced praying God to send out the people, and Saturday evening, the 15th, held another meeting. Spoke from Gal. 3: 29. Good meeting, only few out. Sunday had a good congregation. Spoke twice from 1 Pet. 3: 15, and 1 Cor. 15: 47-49 God's Spirit began to move and there were signs of good being done. Monday evening house filled. Continued holding meetings every night until Dec. 6th, and the result is backsliders have been reclaimed and sinners converted. Administered the ordinance of baptism. The subjects felt that there was a pleasure in obeying God. Twenty-one united in covenant like the church at Danielsonville, Ct. We are having meetings now every other night, and the church is growing stronger; and I expect others will go with us to Mount Zion. Pray for us, brethren, that there may be a happy church here that shall rejoice to meet Jesus when he comes. GEORGE L. TEEPLE.

My Experience;

OR, WHAT I HAVE SEEN AND FELT OF SPIRITUALISM.—No. 2.

Before proceeding to my subject, I wish to say, in justice to myself, as well as to those who may be interested, that I possess no other feelings than those of kindness towards those who are associated with, or are friendly to, Spiritualism, and that I think I have among them some warm friends—those for whom I feel a high regard, and whose moral character is such as to recommend them to the esteem and confidence of the virtuous and good; and that while I honestly differ with them in sentiment, and may advert to facts condemnatory of Spiritualism, and its tendencies as well as its influences, I still wish them well; but believing, as I do, that they are on the verge, if not entirely within the grasp, of the most fatal delusion with which the mind of man was ever called to contend, I feel it to be a duty which I owe to them, as well as to my fellow men generally, to present some facts to their minds with the hope that if they are seriously considered and candidly weighed, will result in their good.

Spiritualism proposes to remove from the world mental and moral darkness, and also superstition, which is said to be hanging over it like a dark pall.

It is urged by Spiritualists generally, that there has not been, neither can there be, any very great amount of mental or moral proficiency on the part of those particularly who are associated with, or are under the influence of, the christian churches of these times. For the reason that the mind is so restricted and trammeled by their creeds and dogmas, that they are virtually and really incapable of penetrating their researches beyond them; hence there is no possibility of their making any proficiency.

Again, it is said that these religious creeds embody certain facts, which have constituted the basis of christianity for centuries; which facts have neither been added to, nor materially changed since their introduction; hence no important field has been opened for the development of the mind's action; therefore superstition is found to exist everywhere, and gross darkness is found to cover the minds of the people.

In this hour of the world's extremity, a new and bright and more liberal light (so called) has appeared, in what I term modern Spiritualism; which proposes to dispel the mental and moral gloom, and so shine into the human mind that superstition can never again have access to it. In short, it proposes to destroy all that is wrong, and lead men to do that which only is right.

Now I propose to inquire how it is to accomplish this work, and ask if, by any rule of philosophy, the means employed can secure the end?

One of the ways in which this end is sought to be accomplished, is by a total rejection of the sacred Scriptures. Of this fact I am fully aware that community are not ignorant; but I do know that from those who are known to have confidence in the Bible, they are sometimes kept, at least for a season, or until their conscientious scruples shall have measurably disappeared, and they are better able to bear their strong meat. But those who have been longer in the way, are free to express themselves as being not only unbelievers in the Scriptures, but at war with its teachings. I now speak what I know.

Again. In the circle of my acquaintance with Spiritualists, (which is quite extensive) I do not know of one who believes in the Bible as a means of salvation; but on the contrary do know that it is by them repudiated, and considered to be of no more value than an old Almanac. (I use their mode of expression.) Now from the above fact (being their own statement) I ask, does not this look like rejecting the Bible?

Again. I would appeal to those who have read their works, as well as those who have listened to their public lectures, in proof of the fact that they disbelieve in, as well as repudiate, the Bible; for in nearly all of them this spirit of infidelity is breathed forth, though not in its most repulsive form. In proof of this point, let us examine some of the claims of Spiritualism.

It introduces itself, or is introduced, as a new dispensation of moral and religious light, and lays claim to the attention and faith of men as such, and is recommended as something superior to all others. Now in arguing the necessity of a new, do they not virtually condemn the old? Most certainly they do; and if theirs is the superior, ours must be the inferior. If they declare the inefficiency of the Scriptures to salvation, we have the evidence in their application to Spiritualism; hence in their public and private, written and oral instructions, they expressly reject the Scriptures, and professedly and avowedly maintain Spiritualism.

Again. Spiritualism is doing its work of enlightening the world and removing superstition, by a total rejection of Jesus Christ as the Savior of the world.

In conversation with Spiritualists at different times and in different places on this subject, Christ was generally spoken of as a good man, and as having died in vindication of his religious views, but that his death accomplished no more than the death of any other man; that such Scripture stories were the work of Priests, to enable them to secure the greater power over the minds of men; hence Christ is by them taught to be no better man than Andrew J. Davis, or many of their mediums, and that they could perform miracles as well as he. The fact that they confide in Spiritualism for salvation, is proof positive that they reject Jesus Christ as the Son of God, the only name given under heaven by which we can be saved; for it is declared that there is no other name by which we can be saved.

Before I conclude this part of my subject, let us for a moment ask whether the work of Spiritualism thus far referred to is likely to accomplish its proposed end? It proposes to increase our mental and moral light by putting out the moral sun, the Bible. It proposes to teach men fidelity to truth, by teaching them infidelity to the most sacred truths ever given to man, and more important to them than all the world beside. It is to make men better by removing every motive to morality and religion as taught in the Bible, and teaches them to govern themselves by reason, instead of the Bible.

Who does not know that in the same proportion as men have imbibed infidelity and laid aside moral and religious restraints, they have allowed themselves to be controlled by every passion and habit which tend to reduce men in the scale of being, in many cases to the condition of the brute. The observation of all the good will corroborate my saying.

In conclusion I would say, that the teachings of Spiritualism either tend originally to make infidels; or Spiritualists, being infidels, make use of Spiritualism as a tool to forward the work of darkness. In either case, their tendency is to mental, moral, and intellectual darkness, and will end in that darkness which is eternal.

We wish to put the price as low as we can, so as to put it within the reach of the greatest possible number of readers. ☞ One great reason why men practice generosity so little in the world is, their finding so little there. Generosity is catching; and if so many men escape it, it is in a degree from the same reason that countrymen escape the small pox—because they meet with no one to give it them.—Greville.

A Birth-Day.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—Seventy-seven years ago to-day, by the goodness of the Creator of all things, I first breathed the vital air In these years there have been twenty-four hundred and twenty-eight millions, two hundred and seventy-two thousand seconds or moments of time. I have this number of arguments, or rather facts, against atheism, for I have not sustained my own vitality a single moment. Moreover, every one of these numerous moments have been crowned with unmerited loving kindness and tender mercy. O wondrous love which took me from my mother's womb, laid me on her breast, and nourished me there!

"Unnumbered comforts to my soul
His tender care bestowed,
Before my infant heart perceived
From whom these comforts flowed."

Amid the folly of childhood and waywardness of youth, the same love preserved me and checked me, warned and instructed me, through the instrumentality of godly parents. And now, to the eternal praise of the God of salvation, be it recorded, that about nineteen years after I was born of the flesh, I was, by divine grace, born of the Spirit of God, "to glorify (him) and enjoy him forever." After ungratefully misimproving his peculiar goodness, setting my affections on things on the earth, and robbing him of my supreme love and service, (which it was my own highest interest to yield to him,) he drew me from the path of everlasting death, by the cords of an eternal love, to offer him, by the influence of his own Spirit, the sacrifice of a broken heart. He led me (O wondrous love) to the cross of his dying Son, pierced for me, where I found deliverance from that load of sin and guilt which separated me from my God.

O for an angel's tongue to tell the sweet experience my ransomed soul then had of the verity of the sacred word, "Unto you that believe he is precious." O the inexpressible joy, peace, gratitude and love, which o'erflowed my happy soul, "when Jesus took my sins away!" In the view of him who was to me in verity the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely, the world, with all its vanities, receded from my view, and was totally eclipsed by his transcendent beauty and glory.

O that I had never left (that) first love. Alas! by sad experience of the truth, that "in my flesh there is no good thing," I had to learn my dependence on my precious Savior for all spiritual life and strength. My sins of pride, worldliness, and heart-wanderings from my dear Father, appeared, by a consciousness of ingratitude, to be of a deeper dye than those before conversion. More than ever did I feel the need of offering the prayer of the Publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner." My experience is told in two items. I am a great sinner, but Christ is a greater Savior.

"Although I have him oft forgot,
His loving kindness changes not."

To the praise of our Father's grace, I desire to record his love in drawing me, in my declining days, into closer union with himself. As in the days of our espousals, is my dear Jesus precious to my soul. Truly my "fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Christ Jesus." With increasing ardor do I also love all who love our blessed Lord in sincerity. Thus I enjoy a sweeter earnest of the eternal inheritance at his appearing and kingdom.

And now, on this anniversary, I desire to consecrate myself renewedly and more unreservedly to the holy and blessed service of my Father. I am not my own. I am bought with the price of the precious blood of the Son of God. O that I may more perfectly glorify God in my body and spirit, which are his. Under the influence of my Savior's dying love, may I be more willing to bear the cross after him, and show forth his praise. Very brief must be the residue of mortal life. It is well, if I may only be enabled to improve this remnant to the glory of God and the good of my fellow men.

Dear brethren in the Lord, I ask you to supplicate this blessing for your unworthy aged brother. Let us watch, pray, and labor for Jesus Christ, and thus make our "calling and election sure" to that glorious inheritance in the everlasting kingdom, promised to those "come out of great tribulation, having washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Soon, very soon, the predicted tremendous scenes of the second coming of the Son of God will open upon an astonished world! May divine love prepare us to welcome the return of the heavenly Bridegroom to take his ransomed spouse his everlasting embrace.

Yours in christian love,
HENRY GREW.

BRO. GRANT:—I have just got out another tract, entitled, THE GREAT ERROR EXPOSED; or, Endless Misery not a Bible Doctrine. The design of it is to quote and explain all texts relied on to prove eternal woe, and should go with my tract,—THE WICKED NOT IMMORTAL, which exhibits all texts for destruction. It will contain 32 pages; just twice as large as the other, and be sold at 2 cents, and so be as cheap as that in proportion to the size. The object of these tracts is, to get before the masses all the Bible on both sides, in as cheap a way as possible, and without profit to any one,—3 and 5 cent tracts at 1 and 2 cents. Ministers who want them to sell, can have them at $1.75 per one hundred. The 200 texts for destruction are also referred to in this tract, and it is, properly, my "GLAD TIDINGS" put in this cheap form. To show that our opponents' texts do not prove their doctrine, is our first and most important work.

From Sr. M. D. W.

BRO. GRANT:—I have received a note from Bro. Bliss, wishing me to correct the erroneous conclusion to which I have arrived by the arguments of Dr. Litch, viz, that man is composed of three parts, each of which, when separated, constitute the man. He says that the Dr. writes him that on page 21, instead of reading "not the spirit, for that went to God," it should read, "It was the spirit, that went to God, who gave it to be disposed of, &c."

I must confess that, after reading and re-reading the Dr.'s argument entire, I am of the same opinion still, viz., that man is composed of three parts, each of which, when separated, contain a sufficiency of the man's elements to justify us in denominating them the man. See page 16. "Either of these three elements of man's nature, by a figure of speech, taking a part for the whole, is called the man, distinguished as the individual. There is sufficient of the man's elements then to identify; there is the identity, therefore he is the man." Here, "three" are named—each, when separated, contain "sufficient of the man's elements to identify him; there is the identity; therefore he is the man." See page 40, in reply to the question, "Which is the man?" I reply, "All are the man, and a sufficiency of man's identity exists in each one to justify us in denominating each, when separated, by the name of the man." I cannot, with these positive statements, come to any other conclusion than that, when separated, there is body-man, spirit-man, and soul-man. In the premises, the Dr. argues the separate conscious existence of the soul; he also argues the separate conscious existence of the spirit, and quotes Scripture to sustain each. While therefore we give, as requested, the correction of Dr. Litch respecting the sentence on page 21, we cannot correct our application of his entire argument until we are convinced that we have come to a wrong conclusion.

Although fully believing that the Scriptures teach the separate conscious existence of the spirit, and this is supported by the unanimous voice of the early church, I cannot believe in a triune man, nor that the New Jerusalem is in Hades.

Obituary Notices.

On Friday morning, Dec. 24th, 1858, the least and fairest "olive plant" "around the table" of Bro. John T. Dixon of Peacedale, R. I., was withered by the chilling frost of death. For many days the anxious parents watched the flickering lamp of life, till at length it expired amid the shadows of the dark valley. But another light, the light of hope, sheds a radiance o'er the dark and weary way, for they "sorrow not even as others that have no hope." As, on Christmas day, they followed their sweet little Hattie B. to the grave, and laid that loved form, which for fourteen months had been their solace and their joy, down in the regions of silence and forgetfulness, they had hope that He who loved and blessed little children when on earth, will remember their child and bring it back from the prison-house of the spoiler.

It was my privilege, a few days previous, to comfort the sad hearts of the family, as they stood around her couch of pain, and feared the sad result. Our dear Bro. P. C. Rodman improved the occasion of her burial by an appropriate and comforting discourse.

Our dear Bro. and Sr. Dixon will now feel, I trust, another cord loosened from this world and fastened to the world to come; and as he "goeth forth and weepeth bearing precious seed," his heart will no doubt yearn more intensely for the glorious day when he "shall doubtless come again with joy bringing his sheaves." The prayers of God's people are desired that this affliction may only bring the family nearer and nearer to the Lord, and that the surviving brothers and sisters may be prepared, with all the family, to meet the lost ones and embrace them when they shall come again from the land of the enemy.

Fading away! thus runs the tale
Of earthly hopes and earthly flowers;
Throughout earth's gloomy, shadowy vale,
We view decay in all her bowers.

Fading away! no mortal might
Can stay the ravages of death,
No human hope can give us light,
Naught can console but living faith.

Fading away! but yet again
Our flowers of hope and joy shall bloom,
Beyond the reach of death and pain,
Beyond the wasteness of the tomb.

Fading away! but for a time—
Ere long these flowers shall cheer our eyes,
Blooming in light undimmed, sublime,
Within the bounds of Paradise.

Died, in Cavendish, Vt., Dec. 11, 1858, JOHN SPAULDING, Jr., aged 53 years.

His disease was a cancer in the breast. It was removed the 13th day of last January, by Dr. Phelps of Windsor. He found it to be worse than he expected. Two of his ribs the length of two inches were decayed and crumbled off, leaving nothing but the membrane that covers the ribs between the cancer and his heart. The wound never entirely healed. He went to Boston, to Dr. Green; he thought he could help him, but could not cure him. It soon broke out again and grew very fast. He was confined to his bed four months. He was a great sufferer, but bore all with the patience of a Christian. He would often say, "I am afraid I shall not have patience to endure it;" but he was the most patient person I ever saw till the very last. He believed he should sleep in the grave till Christ comes to awake the dead, and then he should come forth, clothed with immortality and eternal life.

The funeral was attended by Bro. W. Dow, who addressed the audience from words found in Tim. 4: 6–8. He left a wife and seven children, besides a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn his loss. But we look forward to that day when we shall meet where there will be no sickness, sorrow nor death.

Died, in Northfield, Mass., Aug. 1st, 1858, MIRIAM R. PARMETER, aged 28 years.

She was the daughter of an aged and much esteemed old gentleman, whose companion had left this life previously. She has left three sisters and two brothers to mourn her loss. Her death was happy and tranquil. Near the close of the scenes of life she said, in a low whisper, "Give my love to my absent brothers and sisters, and to my advent brethren." And again she said, "Made perfect through sufferings." She shouted, "Glory to God" with her last breath.

Let us be comforted, "for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth." St. John 5: 28.—Com.

Foreign News.

HALIFAX, Jan. 5.

The Canadian Company's steamship North American, Capt. McMasters, which left Liverpool 10 A. M., 23d ult., put into this port this afternoon, short of coals, having experienced boisterous weather during the entire passage.

PARIS, Tuesday. The appeal of Montalembert was heard to-day, at the Imperial Court. M. Dufaure, on the part of the appellant, spoke first; the Procureur General replied; M. Berryer followed, and the Procureur responded on the whole case. The Judges, after two and a half hours spent in deliberation, acquitted Montalembert of the charges of attacking the principle of universal suffrage and the rights which the Emperor enjoys from the constitution; but, considering the other charges proved, they confirmed the fine of three thousand francs, but commuted the sentence of imprisonment into three, instead of six months.

ITALY.

It is stated that the King of Naples was likely to soon grant an amnesty, which has been so strongly insisted upon by England and France.

A Wurtemburg paper asserts that the Neapolitan and Roman governments have proofs in hand that agents of the French government are endeavoring to bring about a movement in Italy.

INDIA.

The Bombay mail of Nov. 25th reached England on the 10th. Letters and papers detail at length the operations of the military, but there is nothing of striking importance additional to the news already telegraphed.

Tantia Topee and his followers were making towards Guzerat, where it was feared they might do much mischief.

SWITZERLAND.

Dispatches from Basle says that detachments of French troops having penetrated into the valley of Des Dappes, and advanced on Swiss territory, the federal government had demanded explanations at Paris. Great indignation prevailed in Switzerland, and the press was using strong language on the subject.

An Austrian Squadron is formed in the Adriatic.

The health of the King of Sweden was still growing worse.

Ali Pacha had tendered his resignation as Grand Vizer of Turkey, and Riza Pacha was preparing to follow him into retirement. It was reported that the Grand Vizer had refused to carry out the reforms proposed by Xuad Pacha at Paris.

For the Crisis.

A Letter to Bro. H. L. H.

Bro. H.,—Your "Sound Words," in the Crisis of Dec. 8th, appear to me the most unsound (not of any I ever read,) but the most so of any I ever read from your pen. Why should you call 'Advent faith,' 'Advent hope,' 'Advent truth,' 'Advent glory,' 'Advent believers,' 'Advent preachers,' 'Advent movement,' 'Advent conferences,' 'Advent papers,' 'Advent churches,' &c., nicknames? By the term nicknames, I suppose you would have us understand a wrong name, one which is untruthful. Now to me these names are both truthful and significant; although I would add the word "Second" to each; but without this addition, they are quite comprehensive to me.

When I say Second Advent faith, I am understood, both by my brethren and the world, to mean a faith in the second personal advent of Jesus Christ. Now to me this truth, faith, or hope, is of great moment. Had you groped your way in darkness relative to this great truth as long as I did, after having obtained a pardon of my sins, and then have been set in a large place radiant with brightness, all through the instrumentality of the preaching of the second personal advent of Jesus Christ, methinks you would have thought the blessed truth well worth a name. Then I read in the good book of the triple glory that should be revealed at the second advent of Christ, and I called it "Advent glory;" and the promise of this glory did so exceedingly cheer me, I sometimes imagined I felt something of a foretaste of it; and then, in the simplicity of my heart, would praise the Lord for the "Advent glory.' Very many of my brethren and sisters' experiences seemed to harmonize with mine on this point; and when we met in our social gatherings, our hearts bounding with joy for the light we had received on Jesus' second advent,—that he was really coming to take his followers to himself, we would almost involuntarily exclaim, "Praise God for this "advent truth,"—that is, the truth relating to Jesus' advent, bringing up the dead, &c. Now, Horace, were these nicknames? They seemed to be the simple expressions of hearts all warm with gratitude to God for the assurance that Jesus would come the second time, when these eyes should see him in his beauty. Indeed, what name so brief could comprehend more of our real faith? Why was it not truthful?

Again, when I say, "Advent movement," do not all readily understand it to be the great stir through the world caused by preaching the advent of Jesus Christ? Say, what nick is there to this name? When we look back twenty years, shall we not conclude it was high time for a "move" to be made on this point of theology? Where, then, were the preachers who urged the impenitent to lay down the weapons of their rebellion, "because God hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world?" Where were the people that talked, prayed and sung about it? I occasionally heard of one, here and there, but I assure you they were like angels' visits, few and far between. Though quite a steady attendant at the professed house of God, I do not recollect ever hearing a minister advert to the second personal advent of Jesus Christ, either to comfort the saint or arouse the sinner, until 42-3; therefore I could but think it was high time for God to make some "Advent preachers;" and if advent preachers—that is, it they make the second personal advent of Jesus Christ a prominent theme, as they ought to down in this era of the world's history, where all the earthly monarchies and signs are in the past, why not call them "advent preachers" as a matter of convenience, to distinguish them from other professed ministers of Jesus Christ who do not preach this truth at all?

And then you reckon "Advent papers" in the catalogue of nicknames. Pray what name would you have those papers bear which make the second advent of Christ their prominent theme? Is it right to have such papers at all? They did not have any in the Apostles' days. O yes, methinks I hear you say, they elicit much light. Will you please hunt out a New Testament name for papers? Again, you seem equally to ignore the name of "Advent conferences." When those who believe in and love the second advent of Jesus Christ, think best to have a gathering for mutual conference and prayer, what name would you appoint for such a gathering? Would you say there will be a general meeting for "Believers" or the "Church of Christ" in Boston, or Hartford, as the case may be? Would not this have the appearance of arrogating too much to ourselves?

Do not all the sects in these places consider themselves as "believers"—as Christians? Perhaps you say, very well, let all such consider themselves invited. Well, I should be happy to meet any of the different denominations at one of our conferences, with the consideration of perfect freedom to express Bible truth. But if, because Mr. Congregationalist, or Baptist, or Methodist, were there, I could not be permitted to express those Bible truths conflicting with their belief—that is, when I felt the Spirit's promptings thus to do, why then I would rather they would stay away. The fact is, I can meet with these denominations nearer than Boston; but when met, I could not be permitted to express my hope of future life through Christ; therefore I prefer to be to the trouble and expense of going quite a distance in order to meet and confer with "them that have obtained like precious faith with us." I cannot see the utility of those who love the second advent of Jesus having a conference, if they may only talk the same that others talk.

Now, many of us separated ourselves from these different denominations for the very reason we were not allowed to talk what we held as God's truth. Then we saw that the future home of the saints was not "beyond the bounds of time and space,' we desired to express the fact that "the meek will inherit the earth, and dwell therein forever,"—that the saints are not crowned at death, but at "that day" they will all be crowned when Paul is, &c., we well recollect what strong denunciations were thundered against us for propagating this heresy, (as they termed it) accompanied with a positive declaration, "they would not stand the like." Thus we separated by ourselves where we might talk Bible freely. Perhaps you will say many christians among Presbyterians, Baptists and Methodists, believe in the second personal advent of Jesus to set up his kingdom under the whole heavens. Very well, God bless them. For one, I can see no reason why they should not bear a name significant of their faith. But that is their business. For one, I feel amenable to God relative to bearing a true name before the world, and when saint or sinner say "Second Adventist," I answer to that name.

You say, "Let Christ not sect, be honored." Most heartily do I concur in this. Therefore, wherever I can be allowed to talk the faith of the gospel, whether it be among Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Universalists, or Catholics, I am happy to meet with them. But, by Divine assistance, I never will conceal the light God has given me for the honor of sitting among them. Neither will I hide my real name to do so. It is not my prerogative, neither do I desire to occupy the throne of judgment as to who will at last be saved. There is One who not only understands the outward acts, but every motive that moves them thus to act, but we do not; therefore He is the most suitable judge. But if I wish to be saved, I must follow the LAW of God, whether people who seem to be good follow it or not. Mr. J. Wesley believed in and practised sprinkling for baptism. Now shall we, who have received more light on this point, allow (by our silence) that sprinkling is just as good as the gospel mode of being "buried with Christ in baptism," because Mr. W. was a good man? But enough on this point.

You seem to consider it "childish" for God's people to take any other than a New Testament name. I again repeat the question—which one of the New Testament names shall we take? 'Disciples,' 'Children,' 'Church of Christ,' 'Elect,' 'Church of God,' 'Believers,' 'Christians,' 'Heirs of God,' 'Pilgrims,' 'Beloved,' 'Dearly Beloved,' 'Strangers,' 'Saints,' 'Righteous,' or what? This catalogue affords proof positive that God can afford names for his children. And as he affords so many, does it not look as though circumstances, place, &c., called out for them different names? So I think.

And when I consider the infidelity that exists at present relative to the second personal advent of Jesus Christ, I really think the circumstances call for a name expressive of this faith. But if I am unscriptural on this point, I think you are capable of setting it before the "Saints" in a Bible light and I hope you will do so, for I assure you that I as well as others have not done this thing in a "corner." I trust we shall all possess sufficient humility to say with David, "Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head." B. Mathewson.

Bakerville. Ct. Dec., 1858.

For the Crisis.

Letter from Bro. D. D. Chaffee.

Bro. Grant:—I have been deeply interested in the account of the meetings at Poultney, Vt., as also I was in those of Rutland last year. In such things "I do rejoice, yea, and I will rejoice." I do rejoice that the goodness of God does lead men to repentance, and that that goodness is so gloriously manifested in the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked, and more especially so when contrasted with that terrible popular opposite—endless misery. Is it a matter of wonder that men should see beauty and loveliness in the character of God they have never seen before, when their eyes are opened to see such a glorious truth? O how my heart did expand, how the love of God did sink down within me, when I first said in my heart, It is true! And how I have been blest in hearing the hearty testimony of others to the beauty they have seen in the character of God, when they have been convinced that He would not torment the sinner forever! I felt that I had found a new God, and virtually I had.

The two doctrines, Destruction and Endless Misery, often remind me of the two ministers of Longmeadow and Springfield in days gone by; the one believing in Calvinistic election, the other not. The latter says to the former, "Your God is my Devil." Is there a greater contrast between the two characters than between the two doctrines of Destruction and Endless Misery! Is not one truth and the other error? consequently one of God, the other of the Devil? We know it is so. We feel it in the very depths of our hearts. But will it do to proclaim it? Shall we not offend some of our good brethren of the church?

Let the truth shine, brother, sister; clothe her with all the loveliness of which you are capable; present her with all the kindness with which you are endowed. Be firm, but courteous. Don't make any truth, however good or glorious, a hobby. Blend it with other truths. Don't say you can't go into a prayer meeting of the churches and pray for poor perishing sinners, because they don't believe in some glorious truths you love so well. Go in, and let them know, by your earnestness and fervor in prayer and exhortation, that God owns you, notwithstanding the great error they may consider you to be in. Possibly some heart may inquire, Can God so bless one in such (to them) great error? May they not be led from this to inquire, Are they in error? and so finally be led into the truth? Can you better prepare men's minds for truth than by convincing them that God owns and blesses you? What better way of access to the heart? and without the heart, you labor in vain, you talk to a deaf man. First convince men that "God is in you of a truth."

Some say they dislike to go into a meeting where they have to hear so much said about the immortality of the soul, going to heaven at death, endless misery, &c. Well, that is hard and grating to one's feelings, we know, but we are to "endure hardness as good soldiers," and is not this one way to do it? (see Heb. 12 : 1–4.) So I have endeavored to do, and in doing so have occasionally had opportunities for presenting some favorite truth. For instance, in a prayer meeting a portion of Scripture was read which speaks of seeking for "glory and honor and immortality," &c. It had gone out that I did not believe in the natural immortality of the soul, but my reasons had not gone with it. Here was an opportunity to present them, and I improved it—not with a lengthened argument to make converts (for I felt that such would have been out of place in their prayer meeting) but to modify the feelings of some towards me, and that truth, by a few plain, simple questions and statements, such as, If man is immortal, why should he seek for immortality, as just read in the Scriptures? and how can we say that man is immortal when the Scriptures expressly say that "God only hath immortality," &c? That nowhere in the Bible is it said that man is immortal, &c. Now I felt that these questions and statements went home, that if I then had tracts on the subject to distribute, some would have received them from me much more readily than before. They could but see that I had some foundation for my position. Hence I felt assured that the feelings of some were modified.

By a kind, conciliatory course, I find that I can lend books and papers and they are read. So we who are not able to go into the front of the battle, may act as sappers and miners, and so prepare the way for those who can. While being conciliatory and kind, never compromise the truth, no, never! Maintain it kindly, but firmly, even unto death, and God shall give you a crown of life.

For some time past I have attended meeting, where, in prayer meetings, only the one praying kneeled, and the minister seldom, if ever, and where response is seldom heard, except it may be by those outside of the church. Praying under such circumstances reminds me of your very significant expression of your first effort at Rutland last year. You said, "it was like pitching hay against the wind," and so it is. But lately I have been where, when I felt the Spirit and power of God upon me, there was a response from other hearts, and where, if I felt groanings, they could come out and thus relieve an aching heart. O, how good is reciprocity! how it blends hearts! It is Godlike. Amen!

Light Wanted.

Bro. Brewer:—Permit me still to presume on your time and patience by asking for further light on this important subject, believing that we who have given all for the truth will rejoice together when the promised blessing is received.

1. By what rule of interpretation do you "consider the mouth of the leopard beast and the two-horned beast one and the same power?"—Where is the propriety of expressing one and the same thing over under two symbols, when the subject is so intimately connected as you claim the mouth and the beast to be?

I admit that the little horn of Dan. 7, with mouth and eyes, symbolizes the same power spoken of in Rev. 13th, that was to make war on the same people for the same term of time, i. e., 1260 years. But I cannot see as that proves that another beast seen coming up out of another place —"the earth"—to be one and the same power; and if it does not say after, (I thank you for the correction) it does say "he exerciseth all the power of the FIRST beast before him:" and if that does not make him after, I am at a loss to understand the meaning of the adjective FIRST. Please enlighten me.

2. How can one beast exercise ALL the power of another, on the same theatre of action, at the same time the other is in power? You say that "the miracles of the two-horned beast were to be a deception, to say the most of this matter." I wish to ask,

3. Where is the true point of deception? Are his miracles to be a deception, i. e., claiming or pretending to perform miracles which he did not DO, and thus deceive the people? or was it those miracles he had POWER TO DO in the sight of the people that is to be the means of deceiving the people, so that they worship the beast with the mark whose deadly wound was healed? As a specimen of the plurality of miracles, you give the ceremony of the HOLY FIRE, which takes place annually, and also the miracle of transubstantiation, and a legion of other "such deceptive miracles." As to the first, the annual ceremony. If indeed "hell is empty and all the devils are there," I admit it would be miraculous; but for fanatics, whether of Irish, Pagan, or Roman type, to transmute themselves into furies is so far from being superhuman or miraculous, that it seems a special mark of depraved human nature unrestrained by the Spirit of God. Witness the mob cry, "Crucify him! crucify him! his blood be upon us and our children!!" Also the festival of Jugernaut, the revolting scenes connected with it, and the fearful deception of the victim that casts himself beneath its ponderous wheels! As also the burning of the Hindoo widow, and the infatuated deception that causes her to choose it, and laugh and talk with her friends till the funeral pyre is lit and her agonizing shrieks are drowned by the tumultuous shouts and deafening music of the maddened multitude! Truly fiendish enough, but where the miracle? Who ever thought of calling such scenes miraculous?

As to the real presence, it is claimed as a popish miracle I grant, but the point I wish to call your attention to, and all that is necessary for the present, is the fact that you claim these deceptive miracles are done by the "two-horned beast." Secondly, that they were performed in the sight of the beast. And thirdly, you admit those miracles are performed NOW, annually or oftener, and yet you say the two-horned beast must have time parallel with the Leopard beast—a "correspondence of duration as well as sovereignty." As the two-horned beast now exists (as you claim) and now performs his miracles, I wish to ask, has the 1260 years' persecution of the Leopard beast not yet ended? or is the "Leopard beast yet to rise to power?" He must, I think, if there is any thing in the argument of performing miracles in his sight, or in the correspondence of duration as well as sovereignty.

As you think the false prophet is not involved in the subject, I wave that for the present. Praying I may receive the truth as a little child and inherit the kingdom promised to the meek, I remain yours for the truth. S. J. H.

A Fearful Question.

There is a struggle going on in this nation, and among all nations. The Waterloo and Austerlitz fields of our times are filled with fighting men: but it is no longer a struggle of cavalry and infantry, of Gaul and Cossack. A sterner, harder, longer battle is being fought. It is a war of opinion—the war predicted by George Canning the fiercest, the most unrelenting of all wars. What may lie beyond it, we can not tell; for the mass of mankind know not why they are struggling, nor for what. They only know that they suffer, and that somebody is to blame for it; and like beasts in pain, they vent their rage on the first that approaches. Hence, revolutions which invariably spring from a wrong state of things, like revolutionists themselves, are sometimes blind, undiscriminating. The innocent are struck down with the guilty. Wrong has been done, and somebody must suffer. The first blood shed makes the atonement. It was so in France, in her first revolution. In some sense, it must be so in the great revolution on which mankind have begun to enter. We speak now of the war of opinion—it is general—it is fast becoming universal. The scene of conflict has shifted from the court-yard of the imperial palace at Vienna, from the square of the University of Berlin, from the Piazza del Quirinal of Rome, from Kennington Common in London, from the Boulevards of Paris. The whole world is going behind the barricades. Nations are everywhere in arms against the present state of things: and the form of government seems to have little to do with it. Republics are as powerless as monarchies against this universal onset of discontented men. The entire body of humanity is agitated by new ideas—becoming conscious of new wants, and longing for their gratification. What is the struggle for?

And is this discontent universal at home as well as abroad? under a republic as well as under a monarchy? We will show that it is, or fast becoming so. Where is this struggle waging?

It is not in England and in Ireland only where a colossal system of wrong has dressed one man in gold, and sent him to the House of Lords, and a million in rags and sent them to the work-house. It is not in France, where half a million of armed men are sustaining a bold pretender. Nor is it even in Hungary, where an entire nation is crushed by the overwhelming onset of the Muscovite. Nor in old Rome, where the general of one new-born republic bombards the capital of another—shattering with Paixhan balls the tomb of Brutus itself. Not on the magic shores of the Gulf of Venice, where heroic men were betrayed by Bourbon spies, and butchered by Bourbon tyrants. It is in our own midst, where we are as free as republicanism can make us. It will here, perhaps, grow fiercer than elsewhere, for it is not, on our side of the Atlantic, a struggle with forms. It is now almost a century that we strangled the despotism of kings, the tyranny of priests, and made Speilbergs, Bastiles, and Castels sant Angelos, impossible in the new world. We have fought out the battle of forms. And yet the struggle is going on among us; we have levelled the walls of the City of Despair, we have prostrated the bulwarks—but we have only reached the citadel—the castle is still unscathed. The main point is yet to be achieved; the strong-hold is yet to be taken.

We have got beyond forms, we have said. It is true. And we have at last reached the thing—we have grappled with the substance. And what is it?

It is in some sense the grand evil of all ages, but pre-eminently of ours. The same curse which has rested on humanity from its beginning; under all forms of government, in all conditions of society, ever recurring. And what is this giant spectre which has haunted the human brain so ceaselessly, through so many cycles of time and civilization; so remorseless in its exactions of woe; so relentless in its tributes on the human heart; so reckless of forms of government; so superior to the tyranny of laws which bind all things else, human and divine?

We have invoked an oracle which has given but few certain responses hitherto to any man. It may be dumb to us, as it has been to millions. But we adventure, albeit with never so much caution, within the vestibule—not impiously, we hope, resolutely we will advance. We feel that some response ought to be given to honest inquirers—and we feel, too, that we have a right to invoke it, and we will.

To be as plain as we can. What have we, after all, gained by our freedom from kingcraft, popery and despotism? Republicanism! And is this all? Let us honestly ask ourselves a few questions, and give the answers like true men—what has Republicanism done for us?

Has is secured to three millions of marriages happiness? How many of these three million bridal altars are not hung with wreaths of secret sorrow? How many of them are not embittered by green-eyed jealousy—that invincible hydra who never ceases to multiply himself, and who is never subdued? If a true history of the married men and women of New York were written, who would dare to read it? Is marriage made happy by Republicanism? Has it exempted the toiling millions from the curse of ceaseless labor? Ask twenty thousand seamstresses in this city, who are making up slop-shop clothing for six-pence and even three pence a piece! Ask the hundred thousand hod-carriers, mechanics, artisans, printers, hard workers of all sorts in this Sisyphus army of toil and suffering—What has Republicanism done for you? It has made you a voter! Yes, it has given you bread, if you work all the time for it; but has it given you happiness? Has it exempted you from unceasing toil? Has it shortened the hours of labor, or lightened the load? Has it, in a word, given you anything but a vote which once a year you can put into a square green box for one or two men, both of whom are equally powerless to help you?

We might go on. We stop with the question: What do we still want in this country? What do all nations now want? What are we all battling for? What means this tireless, endless struggle of mankind? —Democratic Age.

The Dust-Covered Bible.

Some years ago, a clergyman in Ireland took for his text one Sabbath morning, "Search the Scriptures." In the course of his sermon he quoted a passage from John Wesley, to the effect that the Bible "sometimes had dust enough on its cover to let you write 'damnation' on it." One of his hearers was struck by the remark, and on her return home repeated it. She was overheard by her brother, who had causelessly absented himself from church that day. The startling thought fixed itself in his heart like an arrow. He retired to his room, and took down his Bible. Looking at its dusty cover, and scarcely knowing what he did, he traced on it the appalling words of the preacher.

He looked at them, read them again, and bursting into tears, flung himself on his knees, and confessing his past sins, sought grace that he might prize it more in the future. The Bible became his companion, and to his dying hour he bore witness to its sustaining power, and his joy in the God it reveals.

LINES,

On the Death of Willy P——, aged 7.

He's gone, we'll hear his voice no more,
The last farewell is said;
The loved of earth, the beautiful
Lies numbered with the dead.
Alas, alas, that death should come,
And with his chastening rod
Lay low the fragile child of earth
Beneath the yielding sod.

We loved him well, and did not think
That death would come so soon,
And blight the floweret cherished long,
While in its sweetest bloom.
But sorrow and afflictions too
The human heart must bear;
The bitter cup may not pass by,
And all must have their share.

We often gather round the spot
Where silently he sleeps;
For where the cherished ones lie low,
The mourner loves to weep.
We long to see that morning dawn
When Christ shall burst the tomb;
Our beauteous flower transplanted then,
In Paradise will bloom.

Covetousness and Sacrifice.

A DISCOURSE.—BY ELD. J. HOWELL.

"There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches." Prov. 13: 7.

It has been well remarked by one, that "Everything sustains an absolute and a relative capacity; an absolute, as it is such a thing, endued with such a nature; and a relative, as it is a part of the universe, and so stands in such a relation to the whole." From which it is evident that the term "relative" is used to express the connection between things, while the term "capacity" is employed to express the condition of things. Some of the terms in our text are relative terms; as "rich," "poor," "nothing," "great riches," or something. Therefore the idea it expresses is not to be understood in an absolute, but in a relative sense. It is not absolutely true that he "that maketh himself rich" in this life, "hath nothing;" neither in the same sense is it true that he "that maketh himself poor" in this life "hath great riches," although it may be relatively true of both declarations. The doctrine then of the Scripture proverb which we have selected is the following:

The relative value of the riches of this life, contrasted with those of the future, is as "nothing" to "great riches." How ought such a doctrine to cool our ardor for the things of this world, and lead us to seek the future. Indeed, in view of it, the question proposed by our Savier in Matt. 16: 26, finds a complete answer. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own life." (Psuches.)

Observe its doctrine. For the loss of eternal life in consequence of seeking the possessions of this, the acquisition of this world would be no equivalent.

Observe its contrast. For the loss of the present life in consequence of seeking the possessions of the future, the acquisition of that world would be more than an equivalent.

Observe the doctrine of our text. The relative value of the riches of this life, contrasted with those of the future, is as "nothing" to "great riches."

We will attempt to defend this doctrine by presenting a too common vice—covetousness, and its contrary virtue, with their consequences, which is evidently exhibited in the proverb under consideration. It must be apparent to every one, that the acquisition of wealth by any principle which involves the abuse or denial of any part of the system of christianity, or its author, is covetousness. For a desire for the riches of this world which would involve such abuse or denial, is most assuredly inordinate; and covetousness is "a strong or inordinate desire of obtaining and possessing some supposed good."—Webster. The same authority affirms that the definition of "inordinate" is, "not limited to rules prescribed, or to usual bounds; as an inordinate love of the world." The above position is therefore correct, for the "rules prescribed" for our observance in the word of God, forbid both covetousness and inordinate affection, "desire," as well as the love of the world. Col. 3: 5.—"Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth .... inordinate affection .... and covetousness." 1 John 2: 15-17.—"Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust (inordinate desire) of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Mark! "The world passeth away and the lust thereof," and what will the end be of him who lusts in violation of this requirement? But to the defence of the above doctrine.

I. We invite attention for the present to only five points in which the principle of covetousness infringes upon the principles of christianity.

1. Covetousness is an abuse of divine providence.

We are dependent upon the providence of God for all our blessings. "Seed time and harvest, summer and winter, day and night," are all alike under the control of divine providence. These are to continue "while the earth remaineth."—Gen. 8: 22. Notwithstanding this, it would be impossible for God by his providence to lavish his bounties upon man merely for purposes of pride or selfishness, and at the same time command him to "walk humble," and give liberally. How contrary would such a bestowment be to the gospel of Christ, which requires man to cherish that love which is "kind" and "SEEKETH not her own."—1 Cor. 13: 4, 5. Indeed such a course would only develop the truthfulness of the declaration of Christ: "A kingdom divided against itself cannot stand." Therefore whenever divine providence supplies our wants, and still that providence confers upon us its blessings largely, this abundance is by no means given to be stored up and idolized, but that we "may have to give to him that needeth."—Eph. 4: 28. Observe Lk. 3: 11; Jam. 2: 15, 16; 1 John 3: 17; 1 Tim. 6: 17-19; Matt. 6: 19-21, and none can fail to discover that by hoarding up the wealth of this world, they not only "lay up treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt," &c., but that they either entirely extinguish, or war against, all of those christian sympathies which are really essential to prove that "the love of God dwelleth" in them. Here let me pause and inquire of the reader, Can you make yourself believe that, although the manifestation of the heaven-born sympathy and compassion expressed in the above Scriptures is actually necessary to prove that you possess "the love of God," yet when, by the providence of God, you become possessed of great temporal blessings, that there is no wrong in hoarding them up?

I repeat it. Can you make yourself believe this? I say "make," for I think it would require an extraordinary effort, and then you would prove unsuccessful. Would you dare to thus array the providence and authority of God against each other? And are you willing to meet the consequences of such an abuse of divine providence in the immediately approaching judgment? But perhaps you have concluded to believe that providence has nothing to do with your being supplied with temporal blessings! Read Ps. 104: 20-32, especially verse 27; also Ps. 136: 25; 145: 15; 147: 9; Job 38: 41, and Matt. 6: 24-30, and you will perceive that such a faith will constitute no hiding place from the wrath of God, even though it may have shielded you from the reproofs of conscience. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Gal. 6: 7.

2. Covetousness is an abuse of christian confidence.

The apostle Paul, under the influence of divine inspiration declared, "that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, COVETOUS." What men? Why men "having a form (Greek, Morphorin; the same as employed in Rom. 2: 20; a rule or system) of godliness, but denying the power thereof:" evidently professors of religion. It is more than implied that their "system of godliness" has power, but they deny its power. Now two prominent features of their character are selfishness and COVETOUSNESS. Phylatoi, self conceited, selfish—Philargyroi, inordinately desirous of wealth, love of money—1 Tim. 6: 10. Will not this account very much for the loss of religious power in the church, even of those who are professedly looking for the Lord, and also their lack of trust in and devotion to him? "Where is then the blessedness ye spake of?" Gal. 4: 15. Has it not been unconsciously stolen from you by your increasing love of, and grasping for, the world? How many there are who, but for their strong affection for the things of this world, would be an honor to the cause of God. They have truth enough, theory in abundance, and are capable of defending themselves with the utmost ease when attacked. They are beloved of their brethren, but when in their social interviews Bro. M. is mentioned, all think he is a good brother, but he does love the world too strong. He is always so pleasant, and so ready to sweep out the meeting house, and in cold weather to build fires, but likes to have the others bring the wood, and he will a little, once in a great while, so as not to look too mean. In the same church with him there is perhaps a very conscientious brother, who is very precise in the observance of the duties of the gospel, as so all ought to be; but he has absented himself from the Lord's supper. None can really tell why, and Bro. M. is more surprised than any of them. Must have this matter attended to. It will not answer to let every thing go so loose in church discipline. Moves that something be done, and begins, and to his greater surprise finds himself tae trouble. He has been so long accustomed to think covetously, look covetously, talk covetously and feel covetously, that he has not so much as dreamed that there is any vice in covetousness. The conscientious brother has assigned his reason in scripture language: "With such an one, no not to eat." 1 Cor. 5: 7-11. What one? "If any man that is CALLED a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat." The brother's confidence is abused, and he cannot disobey the Bible requirement, and especially when he is fully aware that to eat and drink with idolaters is to partake of the table of devils. 1 Cor. 10: 16-21. "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of devils." And if idolatry was ever an abhorrence to God, it is now. More on this point when discussing another proposition. Would it not be wrong to thus eat with "fornicators, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner?" Then why not with a "covetous" man?

But it is objected, that the Lord had a Judas at his table. Very well, if he commands you not to have one at yours, what is that to you? Besides, such logic would not prohibit the greatest libertine on earth from access to the Lord's supper. Brother M. may be perfectly correct in theory, but what a failure in practice. Perhaps the cause of God demands his help; the paper he loves to read so well, and the minister he loves to hear preach, need some of "the mammon of unrighteousness" that the Lord bids him to make friends of. Read Lk. 16: 9-14. The poor brother has traveled a great way to preach Jesus, and left a little family at home weeping and praying that God would bless the labor of its head to those who receive it, and with tearful eye ask God to supply their wants. But alas! he receives for all his labor only enough to get home. Who will settle this matter? "God is judge himself." Ps. 50: 1-6. "Take heed, and beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the things which he possesseth." Lk. 12: 15. Jesus.

Baptism Historically Considered.

(Concluded.)

But let us notice more particularly the introduction of the practice of baptism by aspersion, as it is termed.

The Magdeburg Centuriators put forth a work, published in Germany shortly after the Reformation, and patronized so largely that it may be called a national work, its compilers being among the most learned men of Europe. On this subject it says, "They (the Apostles) baptized only the adult or aged, whether Jews or Gentiles, whereof we have instances in Acts 2, 8, 10, 16 and 19th chapters. As to the baptism of infants, we have no example. As to the manner of baptizing, it was by dipping or plunging into water in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, according to the allusions contained in the 6th of Romans and 2 Colossians." And of the second century they say,—"It does not appear from any approved authors that there was any change or variation from the former century in regard to baptism."

Hitherto we find no example of any thing but immersion for baptism until the third century, and then only as "a substitute," or "in case of necessity," as affirmed by the Pope Stephen II.

Sir David Brewster, a justly celebrated and learned gentleman, Editor of Edinburgh Encyclopædia, says in an article on baptism:—"The first law for sprinkling was obtained in the following manner: Pope Stephen II. being driven from Rome by Adolphus, King of Lombards, in 753, fled to Pepin, who a short time before had usurped the crown of France. While he remained there, the Monks of Cressy, in Brittany, consulted him whether, in case of necessity, baptism performed by pouring water on the head of the infant would be lawful. Stephen replied that it would. But though the truth of this fact should be allowed, which, however, some Catholics deny, yet pouring or sprinkling was admitted only in cases of necessity. It was not until the year 1311 that the Legislature, in a council held in Ravenna, declared immersion or sprinkling to be indifferent. In this country, (Scotland) however, sprinkling was never practiced in ordinary cases till after the Reformation; and in England, even in the reign of Edward VI., immersion was commonly observed. But during the persecution of Mary, many persons, most of whom were Scotchmen, fled from England to Geneva, and there greedily imbibed the opinions of the Church. In 1556, a book was published at that place containing the form of prayers and ministration of the sacraments, approved by the famous and godly learned man, John Calvin, in which the administrator is enjoined to take water in his hand and lay it on the child's forehead. These Scottish exiles, who had renounced the authority of the Pope, implicitly acknowledged the authority of Calvin; and returning to their own country, with John Knox at their head, in 1559 established sprinkling in Scotland. From Scotland this practice made its way into England in the reign of Elizabeth, but was not authorized by the Established Church."

A. D. 1643, the Westminster Assembly of Divines entered into a discussion of this subject, when by a majority of one—being 24 for immersion and 25 for sprinkling—sprinkling was adopted, Dr. Lightfoot, a man of great influence in the assembly, throwing his influence in favor of sprinkling. And in 1644, Parliament enacted a law requiring the parents of all children born in the realm to have them sprinkled. See Encyclopedia Americana.

A. D. 1706, the English clergy convened a general convocation; on the 9th of February it was ordered,—"The thanks of this house be given to Mr. Wall, Vicar of Shoreham, in Kent, for the learned and excellent book he has lately written concerning infant baptism." The strong argument urged by Dr. Wall is the silence of the Scriptures upon this subject, believing it therefore implied. But let us hear him concerning the introduction of sprinkling. He says:—"France seems to have been the first country in the world where baptism by affusion was used ordinarily to persons in health, and in the public way of administering it. It being allowed to weak children (in the reign of Queen Elizabeth) to be baptized by aspersion, many fond ladies and gentlemen first, and then by degrees the common people, would obtain the favor of the priest to have their children pass for weak children, too tender to endure dipping in the water. As for sprinkling, properly so called, it was at 1645 just then beginning, and used by very few. It must have begun in the disorderly times after forty-one. They (the Assembly of Divines in Westminster,) reformed the font into a basin. This learned Assembly could not remember that fonts to baptize in had been always used by the primitive christians long before the beginning of Popery, and ever since churches were built; but that sprinkling, for the purpose of baptizing, was really introduced (in France first, and then in other Popish countries) in times of Popery, and that accordingly in all those countries in which the usurped power of the Pope is, or has formerly been owned, have left off dipping the children in the fonts, but that all other countries in the world which had never regarded his authority, do still use it; and that basons (to sprinkle out of) except in cases of necessity, were never used by Papists, or any other christians whosoever, till by themselves." Vide Hist. of John Bap., p. 2, chap. 9. Surely according to the testimony of the good Vicar of Shoreham, in Kent, this sprinkling business is verily a rag of Popery.

Bishop Bossuet observes, "We are able to make it appear, by the acts of councils and by ancient rituals, that for more than thirteen hundred years, baptism was administered by immersion throughout the whole church as far as possible."

Martin Luther says upon this point, "The word baptize is a great word. It may be rendered immersion, as when we plunge something in water that it may be entirely covered with water—and though that custom is now abolished among the generality, (for even children are not entirely immersed, but only have a little water poured on them,) nevertheless they ought to be completely immersed, and immediately drawn out, for the etymology of the word requires it."

John Calvin says, "From these words (John 3: 23,) it may be inferred that baptism was administered by John and Christ by plunging the whole body under the water. Here we perceive how baptism was administered among the ancients, for they immersed the whole body in water." Elsewhere he says, "It is of no consequence at all whether the baptized person is totally immersed, or whether he is merely sprinkled by an affusion of water. This should be a matter of choice to the church in different regions, although the word baptize signifies to immerse, and the rite of immersion was practised by the ancient church." "To this opinion," says Prof. Stuart, "I do most fully and heartily subscribe."

Dr. Whitby, a learned and eminent commentator of the Church of England, says:—"Immersion was religiously observed by all christians for thirteen centuries, and was approved by the Church of England. And since the change of it into sprinkling was made, without any allowance of the AUTHOR of the institution, or any license from any council of the Church (of England,) being that which the Romanist still urgeth to justify his refusal of the cup to the laity, it were to be wished that this custom (immersion) might be again of general use."

John Wesley, the learned and venerable founder of the Methodist Episcopal Church, says of Rom. 6: 4; "The allusion is to the ancient manner of baptizing by immersion." And in his Journal, Vol. 3, p. 20, he says, "Mary Welch, aged eleven days, was baptized according to the custom of the first Church and the rule of the Church of England, by immersion." And again on page 24 he says: "I was asked to baptize a child of Mr. Parker's, second baliff of Savannah; but Mrs. Parker told me, 'neither Mr. P. nor I will consent to its being dipped.' I answered, if you certify that the child is weakly, it will suffice (the Rubric says) to pour water on it. She replied, 'nay, the child is not weak, but I am resolved the child shall not be dipped.' This argument I could not confute, so I went home, and the child was baptized by another."

James McKnight, D. D., for twenty years Moderator of the General Assembly of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, says of 1 Pet. 3: 21,—"3. As the water of the deluge destroyed the wicked, but preserved Noah by bearing up the ark in which he was shut up till the waters were assuaged, and he went out to live again on the earth; so baptism may be said to destroy (or represent the destruction of) the wicked, and to save the righteous, as it prefigures both these events. The death of the wicked it prefigures by the burial of the baptized person in the water, and the salvation of the righteous by the raising of the baptized person out of the water." And again, of 1 Cor. 15: 29, he remarks,—"Otherwise what shall they do to repair their loss who are immersed in sufferings for the resurrection of the dead?"

Dr. Chalmers says, in his lectures on Romans 6: 4-7,—"The original meaning of the word baptism is immersion; and though we regard it as a point of indifferency [!!!] whether the ordinance so named be performed in this way or by sprinkling, yet we doubt not that the prevalent style of the administration in the apostles' days was by the actual submerging of the whole body under water. We advert to this for the purpose of throwing light on the analogy which is instituted in these verses. Jesus Christ by death underwent this sort of baptism, even immersion under the surface of the ground, whence he soon emerged again by his resurrection. We by being baptized into his death, are conceived to have made a similar translation—in the act of descending under the water of baptism to have resigned an old life, and in the act of ascending to emerge into a second or new life."

"But enough—it is a thing made out, says Augustine, viz., the ancient practice of immersion. So, indeed, all the writers who have thoroughly investigated this subject conclude. I know of no one usage of ancient times which serves to be more clearly and more certainly made out. I cannot see how it is possible for any candid man who examines the subject to deny this." So says Prof. M. Stuart. And he adds again, "We are left in no doubt about the generally received usage of the Christian Church down to a period several centuries after the Apostolic usage."

Who does not, with Prof. Stuart, say "it is enough!" Can we have any better uninspired authority to determine this controverted question? I think not, for here are the Fathers of the Catholic, Lutheran, Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Methodist Churches all, all agreeing upon this subject. Before dismissing this subject, let me here express my unfeigned thanks to Almighty God for the testimony of the Church upon this subject.

What, though a Romish Pope fulminates against it! or the Parliament of England attempts to enforce opposition to it by law! or the Legislature of Massachusetts enact a law making it a penal offence to say the baptism of infants is not valid baptism, (as that State did May, 1648,) yet I see no way for me, if I would enjoy Apostolic christianity, but to enjoy Apostolic baptism, which is immersion. Am I told "baptism is the answer of a good conscience," and so it matters only that I have done something which I am told is baptism! Can I answer a good conscience except I can intelligently obey God? And how can I obey him except I am baptized in the manner which he instituted, and which continued with the church for thirteen centuries?

Do men speak lightly of this manner? Let such persons be told that such lightness does not militate against us so much as against the Apostolic Church; and then let them judge whether it be becoming—whether courteous or not.

Do learned men tell me that the baptism of infants was sanctioned by Apostolic usage? Let them point to a single instance recorded in Scripture or history for the first three centuries. What though I am told by John Calvin that "it is of no consequence at all whether the baptized is totally immersed, or merely sprinkled!" or by Dr Chalmers that it is a matter of "indifferency!" shall I believe it for that? Is any man's ipsi dixit—mere assertion—sufficient as a guarantee for something which they themselves bring no better proof as being Apostolic? Will such suffice to enable me to give to every man that asketh, a reason of the hope that is within me? I very freely confess, that for myself, I had rather have at least one "thus saith the Lord." And sufficient for me it is, with all deference to the "godly learning" and superior wisdom of John Calvin and Dr. Chalmers, that they themselves assure me that immersion is the meaning of what our Lord has commanded when he said, be "baptized."

Is it said that immersion is not adapted to the practice of a church designed to be scattered over the entire world—the frigid North, as well as the sunny South? But what of such a suggestion, if I first prove by the Bible and by the history of the Church that such was of divine institution! But to this objection it may be replied again, that if people so think, let them, like the Universal Church of the first centuries, build baptismal fonts suitable for such a purpose. The Scottish Covenanters found it illy suited to their feelings to meet in the open air as they once were obliged to, although better than no meetings; yet a suitable house for worship was better. So we say of baptism: Give us comfortable fonts, it may be; but by all means give us baptism, and not a mere "substitute."

Finally, I am told that to be immersed is an act of great humility, self denial and abasement. Say it not! For what is all that I can endure truly for His sake compared with the deep humility, aye, the scoffs and geers which He suffered who finally bowed His head and died—"was buried, and the third day rose again from the dead" for me! My soul responds, let me be "buried with Him by baptism."

Bro. Grant:—We have just enjoyed the privilege of perusing your late discussion with Dr. Litch, and deeply regret that we cannot supply the calls for it; hope you will hasten them forward as speedily as possible, for we think the cause of truth will be greatly advanced by scattering them widely as practicable. I believe your friends in Ct. are fully satisfied with the manner the affirmative of the question was met. We rejoice that so much christian dignity was manifested on the occasion, which should ever characterize the minister of Jesus Christ. I presume no one disputed the sincerity of the disputants, or their motive to glorify God. It is obvious that great and good men may hold some radical errors. But the question is, "what is truth" on this point? What saith that Law by which we are to be judged at the great general assizes? Why, it saith, "The enemies of the Lord are as the fat of lambs," referring to the sacrifices burnt on Jewish altars. Now I ask, if those sacrifices were not laid on those altars for the purpose of being consumed? And did not the fire burn them up entire, without leaving as much as a grease spot? Where, then, the fitness of this comparison, if they, God's enemies, are to exist in conscious torment, instead of becoming "ashes under the soles of (your) the saints' feet?" that is, certain earthly particles of the man that remain after combustion has taken place, while the volatile matter, belonging to him, is expelled in a visible vapor called smoke? Thus Malachi and David show plainly that God's enemies will finally become "ashes" and "smoke," and when it can be shown that ashes and smoke can suffer eternal torments, I shall believe God's enemies will thus suffer.

But I digress. I did not commence this with the idea of arguing the point, but to request you to forward the "Discussion" with all practicable haste; but I could scarce refrain from speaking out a little of the abundance that is in my heart. I assure you, dear Bro., that my companion and myself do often rejoice heartily for the strength and success our heavenly Father is affording you in advancing his cause. I know you believe in the efficacy of prayer, therefore I take this opportunity of informing you, that often, when bowed around the family altar, do I hear petitions offered for Miles, with all the pathos of affection the sire would manifest for a son. What a boon is the mercy-seat, left to separated friends! Let us praise God for this blessed gift while on our pilgrimage. We still feel a settled confidence in the truth of "immortality only through Christ," and greatly rejoice in that truth.

An incident occurred recently, which you may have noticed in the papers, which brought before my mind the unscriptural punishment of "eternal burnings." A man while at work over a boiler of boiling water, fell into it, which, I think, completely immersed him. Though help was at hand, to rescue him immediately, he survived but a short time; I think a few hours, when death relieved him of his tortures. Now, put the element of fire (which is certainly as terrific,) in the place of boiling water, and let the man exist there, not for a few short hours, days, or even years, but thousands, yea, millions of years, and then his period of suffering is not at all diminished! He must exist in this condition a period commensurate with the existence of the great Jehovah; then we have the idea of our opponents on this subject, that is, if they believe in corporeal punishment at all. But I am convinced that many of them do not believe in literal punishment, but, by their mode of spiritualizing, fritter it all away, like one who remarked to my husband, as they were talking of fire being the scriptural agent by which the wicked were punished,—"Why," said he, "I do not believe the Scriptures mean literal fire, but fire when used relative to the punishment of the wicked, is a figure of speech, a comparison." Upon which, husband showed him that admitting this, he had gained nothing, because a figure never equalled the reality. But, according to the Scriptures, "fire" and "worms" are to be the agents by which the wicked are punished, and they are DESTROYING agents.

Bakerville, Ct., Jan 3d, 1859.

From Sr. Martha P. Heath.

Brn. and Srs.:—I can say to you beloved in the Lord, that I love Jesus with all my heart, and my affections are on things above. This world is not my home. I am looking for immortality, eternal life, at the appearing of my Savior, whom having not seen I love. My home is in the world to come, and my prayer is, Lord, let thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

O what a blessed hope is ours! I do praise my blessed Lord that he has enabled me to leave the broad road that leads to death, and walk by faith in the gospel's narrow way. Truly we have to deny self and bear the cross daily, enduring the shame; but we are supported by his word.

I was about ten years old when I first began to walk in this way. I endeavored to follow the directions of my Savior for quite a length of time; but as I grew older, the world attracted my mind, and by degrees I lost my good hope, and became a wanderer from the fold of Christ; but, through the mercy of our heavenly Father, was never left without feeling on the subject of religion; and two or three times resolved, and expressed publicly a determination to serve the Lord; but shrunk from the cross, thinking, probably like many others, if I could have religion in a little different way, I would have it. But, through the mercy and favor of the good Lord, I am what I am; like the prodigal, have returned to my Father's house, been abundantly pardoned and made one of the royal family; a child of God, and sister to all his children.

I often think of the Brn. and Sisters I have met in different places; and especially those at the last Wilbraham camp-meeting; and how glad I should be to meet with you all again. It is but a few weeks since I came out into the liberty of the gospel; since that time how precious has Jesus appeared to me; the "one altogether lovely, and the chiefest among ten thousand." My Brn. and Sisters, I love you all very much, and anticipate happy meetings with some of you while we tarry here; and hope to meet you all in the kingdom of God, where parting will not be known. Be encouraged, christian pilgrims, to persevere in this good way, knowing at the end is eternal life: then comes the "rest for the weary." The time is near when the Abrahamic family will come in possession of their promised land. I think we shall all be glad when the appointed time comes; especially those that have borne the burden of the day; they have long been waiting, watching and praying for the Deliverer to come. Still pray in faith; hope to the end for the grace that shall be brought unto us at the appearing of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Do not lay the armor by now, but endure hardness as good soldiers,—fight the good fight of faith, and have eternal life. If one out of Christ should read this I ask you to seek the Lord now, with all your heart, while it is an accepted time, and a day of salvation.

"O haste, and get ready!
List to the cry!
Loud it swells; it is the knell—
The close of gospel day."

IV Class. This includes the following eleven; to wit,—desire, mind, heart, lust, she, will, pleasure, discontented, the will, greedy, hearty, appetite.

Here we close our examination of nephesh. In our next, we purpose to examine psukee in the New Testament, which is the word corresponding with nephesh in the Hebrew Scriptures.

The Discussion at Castleton.

This was held at the Town Hall, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Jan. 3d, 4th and 5th, between H. P. Cutting and the editor. A large and intelligent audience assembled, and listened attentively to the arguments, pro and con, on the following question:—"Do the Scriptures teach the final salvation and holiness of all men?" The usual arguments of Universalists were presented by our opponent, but it is thought the truth lost nothing from the examination. As a result of the discussion, we were invited to speak in the same hall Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Jan. 10th, 11th and 12th. Many are anxious to hear more on the subject, being satisfied that there are many portions of the Bible obscured by the traditions of men and theological fables. This place is noted for its stereotyped "orthodoxy," but we trust they are not invulnerable to the simple truth of the Bible. The doors are opening in all directions, and the Macedonian cry comes in earnest. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few. People seem more anxious than ever to hear and know the truth. The doctrine of life only through Christ, and the destruction of the wicked, seem to be truly meat in due season, and we believe that he who ignores these truths is, before this generation, like Sampson shorn of his locks. We dare not be silent on this point. It is becoming more important every hour. We believe the final great battle between truth and error is to be fought on this subject, and, by the help of the Lord, we feel determined to "fight the good fight of faith," at the expense of every thing we hold dear in this world. We would say to all in the language of Paul, "quit you like men, be strong."

Poultney.

The revival in this place still continues with unabated interest. The power of the Highest seems to overshadow the place. The revival is characterized with very little excitement, but deep and abiding feeling. The people seem to be converted understandingly, and enter the service of the Lord knowing there is something to be done, as well as believed. Where difficulties have existed, confessions are made, forgiveness received, family altars are erected, friends are exhorted, ornaments are laid aside, and a meek and quiet spirit substituted, and, consequently, "great peace" fills their minds.

The number of the converted and reclaimed amount to full three score and ten. Forty-one have been baptized, and several others stand ready to go when the next opportunity shall offer. At our last communion, Jan. 2d, about eighty sat down to the table to commemorate the sufferings of our dear Savior. It was a scene of deep interest. Would that all the dear saints who read this could have been with us; but, if faithful, we shall soon meet at the marriage supper of the Lamb. How much more like a reality is the sacrament, when we have it in the evening, seated at the table, with unleavened bread and pure juice of the grape. Such was our communion at Poultney. At its close, a large number of unconverted came forward for prayers, and several found peace. This is the case every night.

Our watch meeting was one of uncommon interest, but as our readers have an account of this in our last number, we will pass, by simply saying, it was the best meeting of the kind we ever enjoyed.

"Come Over and Help us."

A correspondent writing us from Bancroft, Mass., presents an earnest invitation to all preachers of the pure gospel to visit that place, as the Lord shall direct. There is much interest in that locality at present; but they are a feeble flock, and call for strength. Here is a call for labor. And as the writer says: let those who have promised to visit them do so, as it shall be for God's glory. Who will respond to the call?

The Doctrine of Everlasting Punishment: A Discussion of the question,—"Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of the eternal conscious suffering of the wicked?" Between Dr. J. Litch, of the Church of the Messiah, Philadelphia, in the affirmative, and Elder Miles Grant, of Boston, in the negative; on the evenings of November 9, 10, 11 and 12, A. D. 1858, at the Music Hall in Boston. Phonographically reported by Jas. M. W. Yerrington. These shall go away into everlasting punishment. Matt. 25 : 46. They shall be as though they had not been. For the Crisis.

The Prospective; or, 1859.

The year upon which we have now entered, however bright our prospects and buoyant our hopes, is one whose history is undeveloped, and consequently unknown. But it is, nevertheless, best to "hope on, and hope ever;" for, were it not for hope, the heart would break. We are admonished, however, to be moderate in our plans and sober in our expectations. It is mortifying to meet with disappointment, and humiliating to be frustrated in our designs. It is best, by far, not to be too ardent in our wishes, but do right, and trust to Heaven to direct our path. To practice virtue, and conduct ourselves according to the principles of godliness, gives the "assurance of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." It is always safe to do right, and though it often subjects us to reproach, yet there is an inward joy, a heart-felt satisfaction, in pursuing such a course.

How many there are, in every community, who have resolved, with the commencement of fifty-nine, to do better; may be, to break off some bad habit, or to be more devoted to the cause of truth than ever before. May we not hope for the best from those who have thus promised, or shall disappointment meet disappointment, while a greater number of spirits, worse than the first, take possession of the heart? Who, we ask again, are to be made better by these vows, or are these repeated failures to accumulate, aggravating our guilt, and telling fearfully against our future welfare?

We say, then, that it becomes us to prepare for the future. Let its development be what it may, we shall need the grace and strength of Heaven. It may be our lot to suffer the worst of evils, the keenest anguish. Adversity, of the most calamitous character, may overtake us ere another year shall roll around. We are, by no means, secure against the common trials that afflict humanity. The past has done something toward impressing us with the absolute uncertainty of earthly good. No circumstances of an earthly character, arising from any ability or wisdom of our own, can effect to change in the least the common lot of humanity. Wealth is no guarantee against it; it enters the domicil of the rich as well as the poor; both are exposed in the same degree; the evil becoming equally formidable to the interests of all. It may simply contravene our purpose and annoy us slightly, or it may consist in a series of evils or afflictive circumstances, disturbing the equanimity of our entire lives. Whether it be a mental or physical character, or both together, it will impress us more and more of the utter vanity of all earthly good. When then those wearisome nights and days of severe affliction

Do learned men tell me that the baptism of infants was sanctioned by Apostolic usage? Let them point to a single instance recorded in Scripture or history for the first three centuries. What though I am told by John Calvin that "it is of no consequence at all whether the baptized is totally immersed, or merely sprinkled!" or by Dr. Chalmers that it is a matter of "indifferency!" shall I believe it for that? Is any man's ipsi dixit—mere assertion—sufficient as a guarantee for something which they themselves bring no better proof as being Apostolic? Will such suffice to enable me to give to every man that asketh, a reason of the hope that is within me? I very freely confess, that for myself, I had rather have at least one "thus saith the Lord." And sufficient for me it is, with all deference to the "godly learning" and superior wisdom of John Calvin and Dr. Chalmers, that they themselves assure me that immersion is the meaning of what our Lord has commanded when he said, be "baptized."

Is it said that immersion is not adapted to the practice of a church designed to be scattered over the entire world—the frigid North, as well as the sunny South? But what of such a suggestion, if I first prove by the Bible and by the history of the Church that such was of divine institution! But to this objection it may be replied again, that if people so think, let them, like the Universal Church of the first centuries, build baptismal fonts suitable for such a purpose. The Scottish Covenanters found it illy suited to their feelings to meet in the open air as they once were obliged to, although better than no meetings; yet a suitable house for worship was better. So we say of baptism: Give us comfortable fonts, it may be; but by all means give us baptism, and not a mere "substitute."

Finally, I am told that to be immersed is an act of great humility, self denial and abasement. Say it not! For what is all that I can endure truly for His sake compared with the deep humility, aye, the scoffs and geers which He suffered who finally bowed His head and died—"was buried, and the third day rose again from the dead" for me! My soul responds, let me be "buried with Him by baptism."

From Sr. B. Mathewson.

Bro. Grant:—We have just enjoyed the privilege of perusing your late discussion with Dr. Litch, and deeply regret that we cannot supply the calls for it; hope you will hasten them forward as speedily as possible, for we think the cause of truth will be greatly advanced by scattering them widely as practicable. I believe your friends in Ct. are fully satisfied with the manner the affirmative of the question was met. We rejoice that so much christian dignity was manifested on the occasion, which should ever characterize the minister of Jesus Christ. I presume no one disputed the sincerity of the disputants, or their motive to glorify God. It is obvious that great and good men may hold some radical errors. But the question is, "what is truth" on this point? What saith that Law by which we are to be judged at the great general assizes? Why, it saith, "The enemies of the Lord are as the fat of lambs," referring to the sacrifices burnt on Jewish altars. Now I ask, if those sacrifices were not laid on those altars for the purpose of being consumed? And did not the fire burn them up entire, without leaving as much as a grease spot? Where, then, the fitness of this comparison, if they, God's enemies, are to exist in conscious torment, instead of becoming "ashes under the soles of (your) the saints' feet?" that is, certain earthly particles of the man that remain after combustion has taken place, while the volatile matter, belonging to him, is expelled in a visible vapor called smoke? Thus Malachi and David show plainly that God's enemies will finally become "ashes" and "smoke," and when it can be shown that ashes and smoke can suffer eternal torments, I shall believe God's enemies will thus suffer.

But I digress. I did not commence this with the idea of arguing the point, but to request you to forward the "Discussion" with all practicable haste; but I could scarce refrain from speaking out a little of the abundance that is in my heart. I assure you, dear Bro., that my companion and myself do often rejoice heartily for the strength and success our heavenly Father is affording you in advancing his cause. I know you believe in the efficacy of prayer, therefore I take this opportunity of informing you, that often, when bowed around the family altar, do I hear petitions offered for Miles, with all the pathos of affection the sire would manifest for a son. What a boon is the mercy-seat, left to separated friends! Let us praise God for this blessed gift while on our pilgrimage. We still feel a settled confidence in the truth of "immortality only through Christ," and greatly rejoice in that truth.

An incident occurred recently, which you may have noticed in the papers, which brought before my mind the unscriptural punishment of "eternal burnings." A man while at work over a boiler of boiling water, fell into it, which, I think, completely immersed him. Though help was at hand, to rescue him immediately, he survived but a short time; I think a few hours, when death relieved him of his tortures. Now, put the element of fire (which is certainly as terrific,) in the place of boiling water, and let the man exist there, not for a few short hours, days, or even years, but thousands, yea, millions of years, and then his period of suffering is not at all diminished! He must exist in this condition a period commensurate with the existence of the great Jehovah; then we have the idea of our opponents on this subject, that is, if they believe in corporeal punishment at all. But I am convinced that many of them do not believe in literal punishment, but, by their mode of spiritualizing, fritter it all away, like one who remarked to my husband, as they were talking of fire being the scriptural agent by which the wicked were punished,—"Why," said he, "I do not believe the Scriptures mean literal fire, but fire when used relative to the punishment of the wicked, is a figure of speech, a comparison." Upon which, husband showed him that admitting this, he had gained nothing, because a figure never equalled the reality. But, according to the Scriptures, "fire" and "worms" are to be the agents by which the wicked are punished, and they are DESTROYING agents.

Bakerville, Ct., Jan. 3d, 1859.

From Sr. Martha P. Heath.

Brn. and Srs.:—I can say to you beloved in the Lord, that I love Jesus with all my heart, and my affections are on things above. This world is not my home. I am looking for immortality, eternal life, at the appearing of my Savior, whom having not seen I love. My home is in the world to come, and my prayer is, Lord, let thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

O what a blessed hope is ours! I do praise my blessed Lord that he has enabled me to leave the broad road that leads to death, and walk by faith in the gospel's narrow way. Truly we have to deny self and bear the cross daily, enduring the shame; but we are supported by his word.

I was about ten years old when I first began to walk in this way. I endeavored to follow the directions of my Savior for quite a length of time; but as I grew older, the world attracted my mind, and by degrees I lost my good hope, and became a wanderer from the fold of Christ; but, through the mercy of our heavenly Father, was never left without feeling on the subject of religion; and two or three times resolved, and expressed publicly a determination to serve the Lord; but shrunk from the cross, thinking, probably like many others, if I could have religion in a little different way, I would have it. But, through the mercy and favor of the good Lord, I am what I am; like the prodigal, have returned to my Father's house, been abundantly pardoned and made one of the royal family; a child of God, and sister to all his children.

I often think of the Brn. and Sisters I have met in different places; and especially those at the last Wilbraham camp-meeting; and how glad I should be to meet with you all again. It is but a few weeks since I came out into the liberty of the gospel; since that time how precious has Jesus appeared to me; the "one altogether lovely, and the chiefest among ten thousand." My Brn. and Sisters, I love you all very much, and anticipate happy meetings with some of you while we tarry here; and hope to meet you all in the kingdom of God, where parting will not be known. Be encouraged, christian pilgrims, to persevere in this good way, knowing at the end is eternal life: then comes the "rest for the weary." The time is near when the Abrahamic family will come in possession of their promised land. I think we shall all be glad when the appointed time comes; especially those that have borne the burden of the day; they have long been waiting, watching and praying for the Deliverer to come. Still pray in faith; hope to the end for the grace that shall be brought unto us at the appearing of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Do not lay the armor by now, but endure hardness as good soldiers,—fight the good fight of faith, and have eternal life. If one out of Christ should read this I ask you to seek the Lord now, with all your heart, while it is an accepted time, and a day of salvation.

"O haste, and get ready!
List to the cry!
Loud it swells; it is the knell—
The close of gospel day."

44. Nephesh is rendered soul four hundred and seventy-five times, out of seven hundred and fifty-two. The forty-four renderings of nephesh may be reduced to four; viz., "creature," "person," "life" and "desire."

I Class. This will include the following four renderings of nephesh; to wit,—creature, beast, thing, and fish.

II Class. This includes the following twenty-five; to wit,—person, man, him, me, yourselves, himself, we, he, myself, her, thee, soul, herself, themselves, thyself, dead, body, one, any, they, men, own, fellow, deadly, and tablets.

III Class. This includes the following four; to wit,—life, ghost, mortally and breath.

IV Class. This includes the following eleven; to wit,—desire, mind, heart, lust, she, will, pleasure, discontented, the will, greedy, hearty, appetite.

Here we close our examination of nephesh. In our next, we purpose to examine psukee in the New Testament, which is the word corresponding with nephesh in the Hebrew Scriptures.

The Discussion at Castleton.

This was held at the Town Hall, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Jan. 3d, 4th and 5th, between H. P. Cutting and the editor. A large and intelligent audience assembled, and listened attentively to the arguments, pro and con, on the following question:—"Do the Scriptures teach the final salvation and holiness of all men?" The usual arguments of Universalists were presented by our opponent, but it is thought the truth lost nothing from the examination. As a result of the discussion, we were invited to speak in the same hall Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Jan. 10th, 11th and 12th. Many are anxious to hear more on the subject, being satisfied that there are many portions of the Bible obscured by the traditions of men and theological fables. This place is noted for its stereotyped "orthodoxy," but we trust they are not invulnerable to the simple truth of the Bible. The doors are opening in all directions, and the Macedonian cry comes in earnest. The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few. People seem more anxious than ever to hear and know the truth. The doctrine of life only through Christ, and the destruction of the wicked, seem to be truly meat in due season, and we believe that he who ignores these truths is, before this generation, like Sampson shorn of his locks. We dare not be silent on this point. It is becoming more important every hour. We believe the final great battle between truth and error is to be fought on this subject, and, by the help of the Lord, we feel determined to "fight the good fight of faith," at the expense of every thing we hold dear in this world. We would say to all in the language of Paul, "quit you like men, be strong."

Poultney.

The revival in this place still continues with unabated interest. The power of the Highest seems to overshadow the place. The revival is characterized with very little excitement, but deep and abiding feeling. The people seem to be converted understandingly, and enter the service of the Lord knowing there is something to be done, as well as believed. Where difficulties have existed, confessions are made, forgiveness received, family altars are erected, friends are exhorted, ornaments are laid aside, and a meek and quiet spirit substituted, and, consequently, "great peace" fills their minds.

The number of the converted and reclaimed amount to full three score and ten. Forty-one have been baptized, and several others stand ready to go when the next opportunity shall offer. At our last communion, Jan. 2d, about eighty sat down to the table to commemorate the sufferings of our dear Savior. It was a scene of deep interest. Would that all the dear saints who read this could have been with us; but, if faithful, we shall soon meet at the marriage supper of the Lamb. How much more like a reality is the sacrament, when we have it in the evening, seated at the table, with unleavened bread and pure juice of the grape. Such was our communion at Poultney. At its close, a large number of unconverted came forward for prayers, and several found peace. This is the case every night.

Our watch meeting was one of uncommon interest, but as our readers have an account of this in our last number, we will pass, by simply saying, it was the best meeting of the kind we ever enjoyed.

"Come Over and Help us."

A correspondent writing us from Bancroft, Mass., presents an earnest invitation to all preachers of the pure gospel to visit that place, as the Lord shall direct. There is much interest in that locality at present; but they are a feeble flock, and call for strength. Here is a call for labor. And as the writer says: let those who have promised to visit them do so, as it shall be for God's glory. Who will respond to the call?

The Doctrine of Everlasting Punishment: A Discussion of the question,—"Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of the eternal conscious suffering of the wicked?" Between Dr. J. Litch, of the Church of the Messiah, Philadelphia, in the affirmative, and Elder Miles Grant, of Boston, in the negative; on the evenings of November 9, 10, 11 and 12, A. D. 1858, at the Music Hall in Boston. Phonographically reported by Jas. M. W. Yerrington. These shall go away into everlasting punishment. Matt. 25: 46. They shall be as though they had not been. For the Crisis.

The Prospective; or, 1859.

The year upon which we have now entered, however bright our prospects and buoyant our hopes, is one whose history is undeveloped, and consequently unknown. But it is, nevertheless, best to "hope on, and hope ever;" for, were it not for hope, the heart would break. We are admonished, however, to be moderate in our plans and sober in our expectations. It is mortifying to meet with disappointment, and humiliating to be frustrated in our designs. It is best, by far, not to be too ardent in our wishes, but do right, and trust to Heaven to direct our path. To practice virtue, and conduct ourselves according to the principles of godliness, gives the "assurance of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." It is always safe to do right, and though it often subjects us to reproach, yet there is an inward joy, a heart-felt satisfaction, in pursuing such a course.

How many there are, in every community, who have resolved, with the commencement of fifty-nine, to do better; may be, to break off some bad habit, or to be more devoted to the cause of truth than ever before. May we not hope for the best from those who have thus promised, or shall disappointment meet disappointment, while a greater number of spirits, worse than the first, take possession of the heart? Who, we ask again, are to be made better by these vows, or are these repeated failures to accumulate, aggravating our guilt, and telling fearfully against our future welfare?

We say, then, that it becomes us to prepare for the future. Let its development be what it may, we shall need the grace and strength of Heaven. It may be our lot to suffer the worst of evils, the keenest anguish. Adversity, of the most calamitous character, may overtake us ere another year shall roll around. We are, by no means, secure against the common trials that afflict humanity. The past has done something toward impressing us with the absolute uncertainty of earthly good. No circumstances of an earthly character, arising from any ability or wisdom of our own, can effect to change in the least the common lot of humanity. Wealth is no guarantee against it; it enters the domicil of the rich as well as the poor; both are exposed in the same degree; the evil becoming equally formidable to the interests of all. It may simply contravene our purpose and annoy us slightly, or it may consist in a series of evils or afflictive circumstances, disturbing the equanimity of our entire lives. Whether it be a mental or physical character, or both together, it will impress us more and more of the utter vanity of all earthly good. When then those wearisome nights and days of severe affliction shall come, for come they must, sooner or later, and may come during the present year, when the body, racked with pain, or scorched with fever, or sinking under the wasting hand of disease, what shall sustain us? Are we to experience these evils this year? Must we, as has been the case with thousands, call to our bedside our friends, while the tear of affection shall steal o'er the cheek, while, with hand clasped in hand, or by that more endearing token of affection—the impress of the lips—bid them a long farewell? Or, if not to pass to that state "from whose bourne no traveler returns," are we to be stricken by disease, and is this the year when the blow is to fall which is to eventuate in affliction for life? Are we to become sickly, pale, emaciated, deformed, decrepid? Or, if the affliction is not to be altogether of a physical character, is that worst of all evils to afflict—insanity? Is the sceptre to fall from the hand, reason to be dethroned, and the mind disordered, while the dark cloud of despair shall lower, enshrouding it in starless—in rayless night? While we contemplate the possibility of this worst of all evils, does it not lead us to lift our desires to Heaven that this may be averted? Rather let us have anything beside! We can part with riches and become insensible to the shining ore, which, at best, is sordid dust! The whole world's wealth is no more than the unhallowed treasure of an Achan! Let it pass, and forever sink into oblivion; let it sink to the lowest pit; but let me have in exercise and perfection the powers of my mind, and the blessings consequent, and I shall be happy.

But should we escape ourselves, who of our friends are to suffer? Where are the persons that death, with an eye of desperate lust, has marked for his victims? Where is the parent, who, to gratify the insatiable desires of the monster, shall, amidst his cares and anxieties to obtain an honest livelihood, and supply the wants of his family, be hurried away to the chambers of death? Or, perhaps the mother, who, for many long years has watched over the interests of her children, manifesting, on account of her tender heart, that deep solicitude for their welfare which none but a mother can manifest. Who by these acts, are to be rendered fatherless, or motherless, and cast upon the cold charities of society? What son is to mourn the loss of a father, or daughter to weep in secret because of the loss of a dear mother? Or, to reverse the inquiry, what parent is to mourn the loss of children? Who can tell of the sleepless nights of her, whose child, innocent as heaven, pure as an angel, lies writhing in agony, who is anxiously watching the progress of the disease, or its abatement; while the alternation of hope and fear serves to raise or depress the spirits? And though, for many long weeks, she has, as only a mother can, watched over it, always desiring and often hoping it might recover, but at last she sees, what is but too true, that death is approaching, that he already has the darling of her affections in his grasp! How ruthlessly he tears it away, how pitiless! How insensible to the tears of her, who, almost frantic with grief on account of the loss of her idol, is driven to madness, or, which is oftener the case, her health becomes impaired, constitution broken, while life ebbs slowly but surely, till, at last, she sinks quietly to rest! How many instances of this kind in the history of the past, and who doubts they will be repeated, and if so, who of the circle of our acquaintance shall be victimized? Are we to experience these reverses? This is known only to Him "Who sees the end from the beginning;" with whom all is one eternal now; and "who orders all things after the counsels of His own will."

Who can tell what will really be done by or among the nations and governments of earth? They, to be sure, are now in a state of comparative peace and quiet; while their commercial interests serve to bind them together in one universal brotherhood. But is this to continue, and are they to be cemented firmly? Does the past warrant such sanguine hopes, or the spirit of prophecy teach it? Are these interests, under any and every circumstance, to be first or primary in their consideration, and do they always influence and control the other and more sordid interests of mankind? Shall we expect this reciprocity of feeling to continue, this free interchange between the leading governments of earth? Alas! there is, if we judge from the past, but little to hope for from them. The history of this world has been written in blood! It has been the first, the leading object of the nations of earth to increase in wealth and power. No matter what the means, for they have acted by virtue of the old adage, "the end justifies the means." It has been the leading policy, as soon as one became more powerful than another, to oppress and harass and worry, until poor human nature could endure it no longer, and then the demand for satisfaction is construed into an insult; the stronger threaten, they prepare for the conflict, the signal is given, and now commences the work of death; the battle rages long, till, completely exhausted, the weaker yields to the more powerful, with the mortifying thought of a loss of liberty and political identity. This one instance serves to illustrate all, or, at least, answers our purpose. Ever since the mighty hunter commenced his babel, there has been no lack of aspiring Nimrods! What an infinite amount of suffering has been produced by these fiend-like rulers, who, to gratify their ambition, or carry out their malicious designs, have involved whole nations in war! How much better it would have been for community, if the tyrants, ere they had done the injury, had been sent to hades or tophet, or some equally undesirable place, and thus, by their absence, have saved poor humanity this great amount of suffering.

Judging then from the past, we have nothing to hope. The nations, though somewhat changed in their policy and tactics, are as easily provoked as ever; and only lack some frivolous reason to justify the declaration of war. They are used to it. They have reached the acme of their power by pursuing this course, and who knows, judging by the past, how soon the equanimity may be disturbed; while the violent agitations of the passions shall drive the nations asunder, breaking contracts, disturbing the peace, destroying the institutions of society, and plunging the world into universal war! Such a result as this might not be looked for by the "peace man," who, from long contemplation and desire, has, while pouring over the subject, become a mere monomaniac! He sees nothing but visions of peace; his judgment being swerved by his desire! His prophecies are by no means new, the same utterances have proved false, time and again! One illustration is of such recent date as not to be entirely effaced from the mind; it was too deeply written upon the heart's tablet to be easily forgotten! Long had the seer predicted universal and lasting peace;—when, suddenly, from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, and from the Caspian to the Atlantic, burst forth, like some volcanic mountain, whose fires had slept for centuries, but at length ejects smoke, fire and seas of lava, sending destruction in every direction, the spirit of universal revolution! Ascend, if you please, to the top of Mont Blanc, the loftiest of the Pennine Alps, whose summit towers above the clouds; and stand, surrounded by immense glaciers, whose fantastic forms add to the magical effect of the exciting spectacle! Gaze from this point at the busy scenes extending in every direction; while state after state, and kingdom after kingdom, are convulsed from centre to circumference! What tottering of thrones; what political convulsions; what uprisings of dormant nationalities; what outbursts of popular feeling; while desolation and ruin mark the course of this political tornado!! How the mind becomes bewildered at the multiplicity and complexity of circumstances and events transpiring; while more than thirty states and kingdoms are either completely revolutionized, or, to escape this evil, the tyrants are obliged to guarantee representative and municipal reform, absolute liberty of the press, suppression of feudal rights, and equality of all religious denominations! These were events of a year, the year of revolution!

If events of such magnitude and number took place in 1848, what may we not expect in the future, and perhaps within the present year? Surely the jealousies and animosities, the prejudices and heartburnings, the spirit of rivalry and thirst for dominion, the over-reachings and oppressions, may, in an unexpected moment, burst forth, while the tocsin of war shall sound among the nations of earth, involving one after another, in consequence of their diplomatic relations or entanglements, in the spirit of strife; who, like the bark drawn from its course into the fatal current of the maelstrom, sink in the all absorbing whirlpool of destruction! This is by no means mere imagination. The history of forty centuries teaches us of more than its probable occurrence.

If, since the subversion of the patriarchal regimen by the mighty hunter, revolution has followed revolution, and "blood trod on the heels of blood;" if, as is true the history of the world depicts the rapid rise, progress, decline and fall of the kingdoms of the past; what may we not expect in the future? Do we boast of the wealth and strength of our own cities and empires? If so, compare them with the past! Look at Thebes, with its hundred gates, the pride of ancient Egypt, capable of sending into the field twenty thousand chariots, and half a million of fighting men! Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, with its fifteen hundred towers, with a wall sixty miles in extent! Babylon, the security of Nebuchadnezzar, and confidence of his successors; with its gates of brass, its deep ditch, its towering wall; all, all of which have passed into oblivion; the only traces of which are found in the mounds of rubbish seen on the banks of the Nile, the Tigris and Euphrates! Consider, for a moment, the overthrow of the mighty empires of antiquity; or, of the more modern, not the least of which was that of Napoleon, which, though extensive, was ephemeral and passed like all of human greatness into oblivion! What now remains, are the last acts in the drama, the last scenes of human history to be developed, which will be the case sooner or later! "The nations were angry," says the voice of inspiration. The furious and final conflict is before us, of which these minor struggles are the mere prelude! They are indicative of the "MIGHTY RUSH of nations," of which inspiration speaks, and for which the waiting ones are anxiously looking! And though it may not be in their power to presage the time of its occurence, this knowledge being hidden from them, yet they may, and must watch, lest coming suddenly they be found sleeping.

It is rumored that troubles have broken out among the Kabyles, and Gen. Mahon had left Paris to resume the command of the army in Algeria.

SERVIA.

Important insurrectionary movements are reported in Servia.

Advices from Belgrade say that on the 22d the National Assembly requested the Prince to abdicate. The Prince promised to send a reply on the 23d, but for his personal safety sought refuge in a Turkish fortress. The National Assembly then declared him dismissed, because, in his opinion, he left the country without a government, and he was regarded in the light of a fugitive. The National Assembly then proclaimed Prince Miloech Prince of the Servians. A provisional government was formed. The army had exhibited opposition to Prince Miloech, but all military counter-revolutionary movement was prevented. Prince Alexander, who remains in the Turkish fortress, protested against the proclamation for his dethronement, that Austria was remaining neutral, but was sending reinforcements to her troops on the frontiers near Servia.

Obituary Notices.

Departed this life, Mrs. HANNAH WEARE, mother of Sr. Silas Whitticher of Northfield, Mass., on the 7th of Oct. 1858, aged 71 years, 4 months.

Our departed sister was a firm and exemplary christian; and she died in the full triumphs of faith to await the blessed morning of the resurrection of the just. Her spirit was ripening for the change, and she looked forward to death with great composure for a number of weeks. She said when dying; "I long to get home." She seemed unwilling to have any one desire to keep her from her long sought rest. Her daughter has lost the company of a respected mother, and society a christian and exemplary woman.

PROMISE.

BY MRS. MARY ARTHUR.

Go forth to meet thy duty,
  Where e'er its path may be;
And more than peace or beauty
  Shall make it fair to thee.
Though tears must dim thy sun-glow,
  And thy skies in gloom be drest,
"My presence shall go with thee,
  And I will give thee rest."

Shrink not, when pain and weariness
  Thine inmost soul shall thrill,
Amidst the mournful dreariness,
  Thy hand must not be still.
Take then the words I give thee,
  To heal thy aching breast:
"My presence shall go with thee,
  And I will give thee rest."

The earth is not for resting,
  Nor the night for sleep alone;
Need is not for voice attesting
  For the weary-hearted moan:
But the mourner shall find comfort,
  The weeper shall be blest—
In my "house of many mansions"
I will give them endless rest.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 9.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I left the narration of the young lady where she had no disposition to bear prayer offered on her behalf. She says: "My beloved pastor visited me, and urged me to believe that 'whosoever will' reached me but I thought I knew better. Indeed, I was not among those; I did not now will to come—I did not try to come. I felt that should I leave to the church an evidence that God had received me at that late hour, some of them in hope of the same mercy, might defer a part of their work until the end, and find themselves, in consequence, shut out from the joys of Heaven. My friends were in indescribable anguish at this change in my feelings. They wept and prayed for and with me, but for a time all in vain. They read to me from the word of God that he had no pleasure in the death of any. They assured me that if I was lost it would be because I willed it—that God's provisions reached to me, and that all that was lacking was for me to accept. But I did not desire to accept. I felt, let me be lost, if I may, by my dying despair, win one christian to be wholly devoted to Christ.

For days this despair continued. I would scream, lost! lost! lost! until my exhausted powers failed; when sinking, I would earnestly wish that no means might be used to bring me back to life. Why would they not let me go, that I may know the worst? My dear mother would pray me not to thus destroy myself; urging that if I was not, as I said, prepared to die, I was using the very means to secure eternal death; when, if I remained quiet I might recover, and give an opportunity yet to adorn the christian character, as I so much wished I had done before. I at length began to wish to live, and accordingly began to be more quiet, if thereby I might facilitate recovery. A beloved brother, in whose piety I had all confidence, and who is now a member of the East Genesee Conference, was instrumental in leading me to claim Christ again as my Savior. No sooner did I hope that his blood availed for me, than I began rapidly to recover . . . "My friends thought that, had I died, I would have been saved. Bro. and Sister I. assured me that I would have been lost. This I believed." She made an unreserved consecration of herself to God, and by a relation of her painful experience, seeks to warn others of the danger of living as she lived, hoping that all would at last be well.

And now, my dear friend, will you not take warning from her, and fear to procrastinate the hour of consecration? You owe it to God, who hath purchased you with the costly price of his dear Son; you owe it to Christ, who hath redeemed you; you owe it to the world, who look upon you as an example of christianity; you owe it to yourself, to your happiness, your life, to yield obedience to the requirements of the gospel, and enjoy the saving power of the atonement.

When your heart is cleansed from its pollution, and filled with the perfect love of God, you will not have to drag yourself reluctantly to the closet for prayer, but you will love to pray; you will not fear to speak for Jesus, but will love to witness for him; you will not shrink from warning the sinner, or praying with the suffering, but will find it easy and delightful employment. There is a great difference between the service of love and the service of fear. When we serve God because we love to serve him, it is blessed employment. Now you are in bondage; but when this love enters your heart, you will be free! Now you easily fall into temptation, but then you will find within your soul a mighty resisting power! Now you find it hard to believe God; then you will find it just as easy to exercise faith as it is to breathe! Now you find the love of dress, and the friendship and honor of the world, has a great influence over you; then you will be crucified to the world—its pleasures, its vanities and its emoluments. "The world to come," with its unfading glories, its imperishable treasures and immortal pleasures, will attract you away from earth's fleeting joys; and you will enjoy communion, O, how sweet! with God and Christ, through the indwelling Comforter, and long to see the Savior and dwell with him forever.

None so happy here as the devoted christian—the Bible christian; all things work together for his good; he has the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come; peace like a river—joy unspeakable and full of glory—the earnest of his future inheritance here, and life everlasting in the world to come.

Say, dear M——, will you be an humble, faithful, devoted christian? God help you to say, "Yes, I will!"

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

For the Crisis.

"We are Passing Away."

Our days and weeks and months and years glide swiftly by, leaving little save sorrow's trace behind. And while we reflect on the solemn subject, a feeling of sadness will involuntarily creep over the mind. We think of mis-spent opportunities, of moments uselessly, and perhaps worse than uselessly employed; we think of scenes of sorrow through which we have been called to pass, and scenes of joy and gladness spent in the society of our dear friends who now sleep in the silent grave.

With many others I have been afflicted; a dear sister and mother have been taken from me and lie buried in the ground. But they rest in hope; they

"Sleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

And they will rise again in the resurrection at the last day. O joyful thought! I shall meet them again, where parting never will come. They passed away from earth like the setting of a summer's sun, and I thought not as day after day a lingering consumption preyed upon them, and gradually drew the color from the cheek and the light from the eye, how sudden would be the parting; but it came at last, and O the bitterness of those hours, when I first realized that they were indeed still in death. And even then I did not realize how great was my loss, but as day after day has passed away, how have I missed the smiling face, the gentle voice, the words of encouragement that were wont to fall from those lips now cold and lifeless. But I would not murmur, I know that it is God who has afflicted me, and I will strive to be reconciled to his will.

We are passing away, everything around us speak, to us that it is so. The changing seasons tell us that we are passing away. We may visit the burying ground, and as we read the inscription on each monument, we are reminded that the young and the old have passed away. Their days of probation have ended, their accounts are sealed up awaiting the judgment.

Dear reader, you and I are hastening to the judgment. O let us spend our fleeting moments wisely, and then we may not regret, but rather rejoice at their rapid flight, for they hasten on a brighter day. A day that never will pass away, when Christ will visit his people, and his own soft hand will wipe away the last sorrowing tear. A day when the righteous of all ages shall behold their Savior face to face. There will be the patriarchs and prophets, apostles and martyrs, and all that overcome and endure to the end. In those days Judea shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely; death, sorrow and sighing will forever flee away. The inhabitants will never say they are sick, and the people which dwell therein shall be forgiven their sins. AMELIA CRABTREE.

The Force of Truth.

Many and great have been the triumphs of truth over error; great moral victories of light over darkness, of grace over sin, of the pure word of life over the long cherished traditions, superstitions, and inwrought prejudice and pride of the human heart. "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes!" He has the hearts of all men at his disposal, and can make use of the weakest instruments to accomplish his purpose, and promote his glory and the salvation of his people.

Look at the poor, pitiful, timid, discontented prophet Jonah; just escaped from his three days' prison in the belly of the great fish. Is this the man who is to be the instrument, in the hand of God, to humble in the dust the proud city of Nineveh, and bring down her king, princes, nobles, and all the people, from the height of their glory and power to confess their sin in sackcloth and ashes, and seek for mercy? Here we have one demonstration that it is not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts, that the haughtiness of man is brought down, and the loftiness of man laid low, and the Lord alone exalted in the day of his power.

Look again at those eleven poor fishermen of Galilee, illiterate, and without honor in their own country; so full of fear, as to forsake their Lord and Master when seized by his enemies; and one of them so cowed at the voice of a woman, as three times to deny that he knew him! Yet these are the men who, but a few days afterwards, turned the world upside down; filled Jerusalem, Judea, and even proud, imperial Rome itself, with their doctrine. That veritable Peter, who denied his Lord and Master,—see him now, boldly preaching Christ to the multitude, and at that single sermon, three thousand souls were converted to the faith of Christ! Surely this was the mighty power of God.

Look again at that poor German monk, Martin Luther, shut up in his cell, unnoticed and unknown. In searching amongst the dusty books of the library, he discovered a Latin Bible; and with this book in his hand, and its sacred truths in his heart, he was the means of shaking to its very base the Pontifical throne of the Antichristian power of Rome! Popes, cardinals, bishops, and priests, all felt the power of his tongue and pen; and emperors, kings, and princes, were unable to arrest the progress of the mighty reformation, that swept over Europe like a tornado, and to which we now owe all that we enjoy of religious light and liberty. Truly it may be said, this hath God wrought; to Him be all the praise.

We come down now to these latter days, when iniquity abounds, the love of many waxes cold, the word of God is turned into fables, and the commandments, traditions, and the creeds of fallible men, turn multitudes from the truth as it is in Jesus, to believe a lie, because they love not the truth, but obey unrighteousness. A few humble and despised followers of Jesus, who are of no reputation in the world, or in a worldly church, have dared to assert the right of private judgment in matters of religion and faith, and to take the Bible, and the Bible alone, as their rule of faith and practice. In doing this, they have discovered that many errors have crept into the church in the first ages of christianity, which are at variance with the word of God, and bring dishonor on his name and character, as revealed in his word and works; and which were not thoroughly purged at the reformation, but have been suffered to take root, and increase so rapidly as to produce and nourish one of the greatest evils and dangers the world has ever witnessed; and which, if not arrested by the word of God, bids fair to revolutionize all civil liberty, religious truth, and moral obligations; and reduce the world to a system of barbarism, infidelity and atheism, hitherto unknown in the history of man! I mean what is denominated "modern Spiritualism."

Against this whole system of "Spiritualism," orthodox or otherwise, founded on the unscriptural dogma of the "immortality of the soul," and its conscious existence after death, this little band have drawn the sword of the Spirit, (the word of God;) have thrown away the scabbard, and mean, by God's grace, to stand or fall in this good cause. True, they have been reviled, persecuted, turned out of the churches, denounced as heretics, infidels, atheists, &c. Those who call themselves ministers of the gospel have been their chief opposers, and have used all efforts in their power to keep the truth from spreading; not so much by open and manly argument, as by closing all the churches and religious periodicals from any examination, or even notice of any controversy on these subjects.

"A masterly inactivity" has been their best argument; but they cannot thus easily put a stop to the inquiry which must soon agitate the public mind on this subject, and which already begins to develop itself wherever the subject of the immortality of the soul has been fairly presented to the inquirer after truth. Men are astonished to find that the Bible is not only silent on this subject, but plainly and clearly declares, that "the soul that sinneth it shall die;" and "that eternal life is the gift of God, through Jesus Christ;" only to be obtained by a resurrection from the dead, when he shall come in his kingdom. "Ye shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just;" not before; "for the dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." Arrayed against this truth are the great, the wise, the learned of all nations, christian and heathen. All the churches, colleges, professors, ministers, doctors of divinity, of all the multitude of christian sects; add to this the prejudice of education, the universal faith of many centuries; the love of popularity, the fear of man, and the pride of the human heart, that is opposed to everything that would tend to lower the fancied dignity of human nature, or induce a change of opinion in matters of faith.

We may well ask, who is sufficient to stem such a tide of opposition as this? What presumption in a few obscure individuals, without influence, property, or power, to attempt such an hopeless task! Yet see the result; in several of the New England states the hated and despised doctrines of the mortality of man, the sleep of the dead till the resurrection, and the final destruction of the wicked at the judgment of the great day, are being publicly proclaimed, and multitudes are flocking to hear the word; are convicted of its truth, and become humble followers of Christ! Infidels, Universalists, elders and deacons of churches, come forward, and, in the face of the most bitter opposition and ridicule, stand firm and invincible on the rock of Divine truth. Surely something more than human power is here!

I speak what I know, and testify what I have seen the last week in the sequestered village of Poultney, Vermont. The whole community is moved and agitated, like the leaves of the forest in a mighty wind. The heart of the proud and rebellious sinner is bowed down in the dust of deep humility, under a sense of the love of God, in delivering him from the fear of endless torment in a future world; and giving him a good hope through grace of the gift of eternal life through Christ, at the resurrection of the just. He is made to see and feel a beauty and harmony in the word of God before unknown; and he takes that word as a light to his feet and a lamp to his path, through this wilderness world, to his rest in the kingdom of Christ. Under the influence of these truths, and of these only, can the bewitching influence of "Spiritualism" be prostrated; "the dead know not anything;" then they do not communicate. All other creeds and systems "give aid and comfort to the enemy," and by the admission of the truth of his theory. J. PARRY.

Individual Duty.

"So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together with the half thereof; for the people had a mind to work."

Each builder commenced over against his own house. Each one in earnest commenced his own work, feeling the responsibility his own; resolving to make one earnest, honest effort for the building of the wall and the staying of the enemy's power. Each builded until his portion joined that of his neighbor.

So let each christian do, with willing hands and cheerful heart, just that work that his heavenly Master assigns him, looking to Him alone for direction how to work, and what material to use, and we will, by the blessing of God assisting us, show our enemies a wall we need not be ashamed of; every stone hewn out and polished according to the direction of the great Architect. God has called none to be idlers. All may do something to promote this great work—the work of bringing souls to Jesus, and preparing our own hearts to meet our Master in peace. All can make one honest effort for the salvation of some perishing one.

At the commencement of the religious interest last winter, a pastor felt it his duty to call on some of his parish. He went; finished his calls, and was returning home. A voice within says, "call at Sister L.'s." He could see no reason why he should call there; he had been there recently. He passed on; passed a number of streets towards his home, when the voice again says, "call at Sister L.'s." This time he felt it was the voice of God, and obeyed. The family were out excepting the eldest son, a young man some nineteen years of age. The pastor spoke to him of the interest of his soul; the great preparation necessary to meet the "Judge of all the earth in peace." On taking his leave he asked him, "Have you attended any of the prayer meetings?" He replied, "I have not." The pastor kindly urged him to attend, and added, "Providence permitting, will you promise to attend this evening? we will try and do you good." He said he would comply with the request. He did so, and was present at the evening meeting. The pastor spoke of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and the need of pardon through the blood of a crucified Savior. He felt very deeply, and resolved to seek the Lord. Sins long forgotten rose up before him. He reflected upon particular sins, and tried to humble himself on account of them, confessing them to God. The early religious privileges he had enjoyed, made his sins more aggravated. He continued to attend the meetings for prayer and conference, but as yet no ray of light broke in upon his soul. All was dark. One evening after meeting he felt he could hold out no longer. He was willing to do, or be, just what God required. He cast himself unreservedly on the merits of a crucified Redeemer, and ere morning knew by happy experience what it is to believe on the Son of God. That young man is now a student for the ministry. One honest effort brought him to the Savior, and who can measure the good that may result from his conversion?

Christless sinner, will you not make one sincere, honest effort for your own salvation? You must shortly stand before the judgment seat of Christ. How will you appear; with joy, or sorrow? O! throw yourself now at the foot of the cross, and seek pardon for all your sins. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." NELLIE.

Springfield, Mass., Dec. 24th, 1858.

For the Crisis.

1 Cor. 3: 10-15.

It is generally believed, from these verses, that all those who look to Christ as their hope of salvation, though their faith and practice be at variance with the requirements of the gospel, will be saved in the day of the Lord, with this exception, that their works, which are not in accordance with the gospel, will be burned, which burning will consume their errors, etc., and cause the loss spoken of by the Apostle. If this view is correct, then I see not why the Universalists, Papists, and all other errorists who professedly trust in Christ, are not safe.

As this conclusion is at variance with many plain and positive portions of the Scriptures, it will be well to take another view of the subject. From the context, it appears that Paul had laid the true foundation, upon which the Corinthian church was established; and that Apollos and Cephas had aided in building it up, and had added promiscuously (just as other builders have since done) good and bad members, termed "gold, silver, precious stone, wood, hay, and stubble."

The true idea seems to be this; that the day would come when the work of those builders, and the edifice they were rearing, would be tried by fire, which would manifest the righteous, who would then shine as stars in the crown of the rejoicing of those who had been instrumental of their salvation, "forever and ever;" at the same time, the hay, wood, and stubble portion thereof would be consumed, causing the loss referred to by the Apostle. But, as those builders had built upon the true foundation—had truly and faithfully fed and watered their flock by the pure "words of truth," they themselves would be saved, so as by fire.

Hence it appears that the individual members of the professed church of Christ constitute the two classes of the text, and not two distinct characteristics of individual members; one part of which (the dross) is to be destroyed, whilst the other will be saved; and that the ministers who build up the churches of Christ, are the ones whose works are to be tried by fire. P. ALLING.

Thoughts on the Two-Horned Beast.

BRO. GRANT:—It is a long time since I have written anything for publication, but with your permission I will give you a few thoughts on the two-horned beast of Rev. 13th chapter. I had supposed, until a few months, that this power was in the past; but I now believe it is in the future. We have in this prophecy the two-horned beast, the beast with the deadly wound, and the dwellers on the earth, which comprise all the parties brought to view in this prophecy, if we except those that have wisdom to count the number of his name. The dwellers on the earth are deceived by the miracles; they make the image, and as many dwellers on the earth as refuse to worship the image are killed. I cannot see that God's people are entangled in the events here brought to view, for as I understand Luke 21: 34-35, the dwellers on the earth are not the saints of God. We are plainly told that the dragon should persecute the followers of Christ, that the leopard should make war with the saints, and overcome them, for forty-two months, and if we are to meet another bloody power, would not John have seen it as plainly as he did under the dragon and leopard?

Paul's man of sin, I think, is the two-horned beast, and the saints are not interwoven even here, but it is all confined to devils, and those that love not the truth. 2 Thess. 2, 1 Tim. 4: 1-3.

We are told in the 12th verse, that the two-horned beast exerciseth all the power of the leopard. The leopard received from the dragon, first, power, second, a seat, third, great authority. The two-horned beast does not get the seat nor great authority from the leopard, which proves that he is much weaker than the leopard, and that weakness consists is his being unable to punish the saints, for the forty-two months being in the past, and they cover all the time that the church were to encounter a power to consume and destroy. Dan. 7: 25, 26.

In the 14th verse we are told that the two-horned beast shall do miracles in the sight of the leopard, and I do not see how it would be otherwise, as long as the leopard retains his seat, which will be until the pouring out of the 5th vial, and perhaps longer.

I think we are apt to overlook the chronology of events, for I see some confound the miracles of the two-horned beast with the miracles of the false prophet. The two-horned beast does his miracles before the image is made; the false prophet performs his afterwards. Rev. 19: 20. At the pouring out of the 6th vial we see the dragon wrestles with the other two, to work miracles to deceive the whole world, and then, "Behold I come as a thief." THOS. L. SALTONSTALL.

For a single copy 3 months	.50
Five copies to one address for 6 months	4.50
Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address for 6 months,	16.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send us as much in addition to their subscription as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

TRUE FRIENDSHIP.

'Tis not when prospered to profess
To have the love true friends possess,
Yet soon as sorrow hath its sway,
Ne'er lend our aid, but turn away;
Ah! no, not thus; but when we find
A friend that's always true and kind,
In sickness, sorrow or distress,
Such have the love true friends possess.

'Tis not when lowly in the dust
We view our fellow beings crushed,
To turn away with scorn and pride,
And pass them by the other side;
But when we see them sore distrest
In cruel bondage, and opprest,
With arduous love and holy zeal,
Our brother's sorrows we should feel.

'Tis not when others' faults we hear,
To love to tell them with a sneer;
'Tis not to backbite or to blame,
When we ourselves have done the same.
'Tis when we see an erring one
With gentle words to virtue won,
With acts of kindness we can show
What 'tis to feel a brother's woe.

'Tis not that when the poor we see,
To feel ourselves of high degree;
For God respecteth not the proud,
Nor those who give, to sound it loud.
Then let us heed what God hath said—
All nations of one blood are made,
The black, the white, the rich, the poor,
All stand alike at mercy's door.

True friendship, then, is love to man,
With doing all the good we can;
And he who helps in time of need,
Is a true friend in very deed.
But there's a Friend more true than all,
On whom in trouble we can call;
Then let us seek this heavenly friend,
On Him we always can depend.

Covetousness and Sacrifice.

A DISCOURSE.—BY ELD. J. HOWELL.

"There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches." Prov. 13: 7.

3.—Covetousness is an abuse of the veracity of God.

"Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."—Heb. 13: 5, 6. In that short sentence; "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," as expressed in the Greek, said Dr. Clark, There are no less than five negatives, and these connected with two verbs and one pronoun twice repeated. To give a literal translation is scarcely possible; it would run in this way: "No, I will not leave thee; no, neither will I utterly forsake thee." He afterwards changes the phraseology a little, and then it reads: "No, I will never leave thee; not I: I will never, never cast thee off." Thus is the church provided with a promise than which nothing can be more consoling. Observe its frequent repetition in the history of the church. Gen. 28: 15; Deut. 31: 6–8; Josh. 1: 5; 1 Chron. 28: 20; and then in Ps. 37: 25, said David: "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." A blessed experience of divine veracity and faithfulness. How full of encouragement to the poor pilgrim as he walks in sorrow and tears, earnestly desiring the coming of his Savior. Again, said the apostle Paul to the church at Philippi: "But my God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus." What more could any one desire than that contained in the above promise?

Observe Matt. 6: 24–34, especially verse 33: "But seek ye FIRST the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and all these things SHALL be added unto you." With such precious promises as these, and many others which we have not space to quote, how wicked must that heart be that would cherish a principle which would abuse the veracity of Him who has not only promised, but who is faithful to perform. O, why question the veracity of God? "Do not err, my beloved brethren. Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."—Jam. 1: 16, 17. "God cannot lie;" it is "impossible for God to lie;" are declarations of that holy word that "is from the beginning."—What will it avail any one to profess that they know God, but in works they deny him? "Such are abominable and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate."—Titus 1: 16. Do we not all know "the judgment of God, that they which commit such things, (covetousness) are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure (marg. consent with them) in them that do them." Rom. 1: 29–32.

4. Covetousness is an abuse of divine authority.

"And why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" is a question which was proposed by our Savior. The term "Lord" signifies "a person possessing supreme power and authority; a ruler." This question, then, should be regarded with the deepest interest by all who profess to be the children of God. How appropriate is this inquiry. "And why call ye me" a person possessing supreme power and authority; a ruler; "and do not the things which I say?" Unless we keep his sayings, we do not subject ourselves to his authority; neither is he our ruler, unless we permit him to rule over us, and acknowledge his right thus to do. If therefore we will not do this, we have no right at all to call him Lord, Lord! We abuse his authority and despise his rule, and virtually send "a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us."—Lk. 19: 14. Jesus rebukes the church for their inconsistency as well as their wickedness, in the above question; for what can be more inconsistent than for one to call Christ "Lord," and live in constant violation of his requirements? Observe the saying of Christ bearing upon the point under consideration. Lk. 6: 30, 35, 38.—"Give to every man that asketh thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again. But love ye your enemies and do good, and lend hoping for nothing again," &c. This is evidently taken from Deut. 15: 7–10.—"If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not burden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother. But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the Lord against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him," &c. In Luke this requirement is expressed without the limit to brethren, and we are commanded to "give to every man," &c. Is not this saying to be observed? And that too without that covetous thought that he may obtain it elsewhere, or by some other means? O, remember that "from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts—covetousness;" and that these "defileth the man," and "if any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." Mar. 7: 21–23; 1 Cor. 3: 16, 17. "But . . . covetousness, let it not be once named (exist) among you as becometh saints."—Eph. 5: 3. Will you abuse—set at nought, the authority of God, and count the existence of such a deadly evil in your heart? "Take heed, and beware of COVETOUSNESS."

II. In order to encourage the renunciation of the vice of covetousness, we will present for consideration a motive; viz.:

The inefficiency of riches to render aid when help is most needed.

Of what avail, or indeed of value, to the passengers on board of the Central America, when returning home from California, was their silver and gold, when about to find a watery grave? See them as they take their belts from their bodies, and treasures from their trunks of gold and choice gems, and throw them promiscuously about the cabin. See the thousands of dollars lying untouched upon the cabin floor, of no value to their possessors, or to any other, and learn a lesson of the temporary value of every thing here, and how little aid it all confers upon a man while death stares him in the face.

But a darker picture than this is before us. How will you estimate your hoarded up treasures when "the day of the Lord's wrath" comes? "Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath." Observe Zeph. 1: 18; Prov. 11: 4; 10: 2; Ezek. 7: 19; Isa. 2: 19–21, and you will not fail to perceive that the value of the riches of this world is not only limited by the day of wrath, but that they are indeed as "nothing" to "great riches," when compared with the future. Ruin awaits the covetous man, and how dreadful the thought that he brings it upon himself. Says my text; "There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing." Nothing, relatively nothing, when every thing is needed that can secure, and only secure, the votary of wealth from utter destruction.

O my dear brother, whether rich or poor, for the poor may be covetous, we beseech you to "Take heed, and beware of covetousness." Better, far better would it be for all of us, to "wander about in sheepskins, and goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented," and be among those "of whom the world was not worthy," than to gain the whole world and lose our own lives, yea, die FOREVER. Give up the world, consecrate your gain to God, live in obedience to all his commands, be godly, and receive eternal life in the kingdom where the covetous man will never be. 1 Cor. 6: 9, 10; Gal. 5: 19–21; Eph. 5: 3–7.

5. Covetousness is not only an abuse, but also a DENIAL of, God.

"WORSHIP GOD," was the twice repeated requirement of the angel to John the revelator, while showing him the things contained in his prophecy. Rev. 19: 10; 22: 8, 9. Indeed, God has forbidden idolatry in every age of the world, and this is especially true of the present Gospel dispensation; for in the New Testament a reply is demanded to the following question: "What agreement hath the temple of God with idols?" assigning as the reason for such an inquiry, "for ye are the temple of the living God," &c. 2 Cor. 6: 16. The character of idol worship may be easily understood by a reference to 1 Cor. 10: 7, 14, 19–21; Lev. 17: 7; Deut. 32: 15–21, 37, 38, and Psalm 106: 34–38, where it evidently denotes the worship of demons. Said Cruden, "Idolatry signifies,

(1.) The superstitious worship which is given to idols or false gods. Acts 17: 16; 1 Cor. 10: 7.

(2.) The making of any image or likeness of God or any creature for a religious end. Deut. 5: 8; Gal. 5: 20.

(3.) All human inventions thrust into the worship of God. Deut. 12: 31, 32.

(4.) The setting of the heart inordinately upon any creature or object. Phil. 3: 19.

(5.) An inordinate love to, and distrustful care for, the things of this world." Col. 3: 5.

Which of these principles of idolatry do you think the Lord would endorse? Certainly neither. They all alike constitute the one who observes them an idolater, and is an idolater a child of God? or does he not rather deny God? What cares the devil whether you worship himself, or are instigated by him to pursue a course which amounts to the same thing, by which he obtains your homage, and causes you to deny God! In the sequel he gains his point; namely, your destruction. And does not the word of God affirm that "covetousness is idolatry?" Col. 3: 5; Eph. 5: 5. And is not that vice classed with the worst of crimes? Mark 7: 20–23. Perhaps you have not thought it was so great an evil! Did not know that you were subject to such wickedness, and become defiled with lust. The apostle Paul was in your situation once, and declares; "I had not known sin but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, THOU SHALT NOT COVET." Rom. 7: 7–12. O then pursue his course; renounce covetousness, and exhibit the benevolence of the great Apostle to the Gentiles. Phil. 3: 7–21. For "the great day of the Lord is near, it is near and hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord: the mighty man, 'and the rich man,' shall cry there bitterly." Zeph. 1: 14; Rev. 6: 15–17.

For the Crisis.

"Light Wanted."

RESPONSE TO SR. HIGGINS.

In the Crisis of Jan. 12th, I saw an article under the above caption; and as you request light, most gladly will I comply with your request, and impart what I can on this most interesting subject.

First.—I consider in the matter of prophecy, the Bishop of Rome held at one time the same relation to the Emperor of the West that Aaron did to Moses. Ex. 4: 15, 16.—"And thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people: and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God."

And as Aaron was mouth for Moses, so in like manner the Bishop of Rome was mouth to the Emperor. And, as argued already in a previous article, he became a political despot, and took possession of the Duchies of Rome and Ravenna, with the Pentapolis, which created the war with Aistolphus, the King of the Lombards. Pope Stephen made application to Pepin, King of the Franks, to come and assist him, and finally Pepin's son, Charlemagne, put him in peaceable possession of these two horns, or lamb-like kingdoms; lamb-like comparatively, because not full grown horns. And as the pope, or priest-king, was only coming up, when he is seen having these two horns, he was compelled to exercise some of the power of the first beast before him; namely, Charlemagne, who was the second head of the leopard beast, in order to maintain the possession of the two horns. The pope being his mouth piece, had a perfect right to demand, and his patron was rejoiced to comply; for the pope did crown him shortly after king of France, Germany and Rome.

Second.—God has seen a PROPRIETY in presenting Rome under two symbols. In the prophecy of Daniel, in the metallic image; and then in the seventh chapter. Again: "The mystery of the seven stars, which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches; and the seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven churches." Here is another symbol behind a symbol. Seven golden candlesticks, a symbol; and then the seven churches, a symbol.

Third.—You will find by examining Dan. 7: 20, the expression before used in the same sense as in the passage to which you refer.—"And of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows." Before whom; in whose presence. Please turn to my answer to your former queries in the Crisis of Dec. 1st, 1858, page 50, and there you will find several renderings of eminent translators. The Douay has it,—in his sight. Sawyer,—in his presence. Penn,—all the authority of the first beast BEFORE IT. Murdock,—BEFORE HIM he exercised all the authority of the first beast of prey. This is doubtless correct, from the fact that the leopard beast received his power from the dragon, in A. D. 475. So the leopard beast was before the two-horned beast in a twofold sense: in priority, and before him in his presence. For be it understood, that papacy did not come up to all its power until the eighth century, when the pope separates from the Eastern Empire and becomes supreme bishop of the Western Empire. And I would remark on your admission concerning the little horn of Daniel, that the 1260 years only denoted the period that the saints should be in his hand. The pope had an existence before and after the above period.

Fourth.—"How can a beast exercise ALL the power of another on the same theatre of action, at the same time the other is in power?"

Answer. By obtaining the power of the emperors in the precise and literal sense that the prophet declared he would. See Rev. 13: 7.—And power was GIVEN HIM over all kindreds and tongues and nations. If power was given him, then there must have been those in existence to give it him. Let us look further at this subject. (1.) The leopard beast with seven heads symbolized seven successive, ruling powers in Europe. (2.) The first head received its power and authority by transfer from Romulus Augustus, A. D. 475. See Putnam, p. 63, and Gibbon, vol. 3, p. 512. (3.) The Roman Pontiff did bear rule, to a greater or lesser extent, during 1260 years; and the above powers did exist during that time. (4.) During the greater part of the existence of the leopard beast, the Roman Pontiff did, at different times, by different methods, exercise all the power of the successive rulers. Sometimes he obtained it by supplicating, as in the case of Pope Stephen to Pepin and Charlemagne. Sometimes by flattery. At other times, by claiming the immense power of the Eternal King; as in the case of Pope Sixtus V. in the case of Henry, King of Navarre. At other times by various machinations, which none "but him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders," could invent. Here are four facts concerning this two horned beast. Again. In the 2d of Daniel, we have iron as the symbol of Rome. In the 7th, we have a dreadful beast as the symbol of Rome. Then we have a horn with eyes and mouth, as a symbol of Rome in its last form of government. Still again we have Rome set forth as THE ABOMINATION THAT MAKETH DESOLATE. Why all this? Because our heavenly Father saw a propriety in it.

Furthermore, concerning this point, I believe we have Rome set forth under four symbols in the Apocalypse: dragon; a mouth; a two-horned beast; and a scarlet beast. Under the dragonic symbol with seven heads, namely, seven forms of pagan rule, the last of the seven terminated when Romulus transferred it to Zeno, the Greek Emperor. Then Rome was not. It had been mistress of the world under its seven heads. THEN THE BEAST WAS. Rome was dismembered and broken up, and the last vestige of its power transferred, by an act of the Roman patriarch, Romulus Augustulus, to Zeno, the Greek emperor. Then Rome was not. Then another form of Roman government arises out of the Roman earth, namely, Rome Papal; and he is an eighth form of Roman government; most essentially and emphatically an eighth and of the seven. Then the beast that WAS AND IS NOT AND YET IS, became the ruling despot in the person of the priest-king of Rome, in both the political and religious elements of Europe.

Fifth.—Yes, the miracles of the two-horned beast were to be a deception.—"And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword, and did live." You inquire for the true point of this deception. Did it consist in pretending and not doing? Both. The pope did pretend to do what he never did do. He did pretend to have the miraculous power of binding on earth and in heaven, which he could not do. He did pretend to be the legitimate successor of St. Peter, and did pretend to be endowed with the same miraculous power, as a legate of heaven, that Peter did, which he did not possess. That man of sin, the pope, did deceive his devotees by claiming such power. They have more confidence in the word of the pope this day, than in Jesus. The Son of God exhorts them to search the Scriptures. But the pope, with his pretended miraculous power, forbids it. Are they not deceived?

Sixth.—The two-horned beast had power to do his miracles in the sight of the beast. Where did he get power to do his miracles? "And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations." The emperors gave the popes power, and they were not slow in using it. I refer you to Gibbon, vol. 4, p. 422.

Seventh.—What was the first beast? The leopard. Did seven heads constitute the beast? Yes. Did John call it a beast when he first saw him rise, with only the first head in existence? He did. What head was wounded? The first—the Greek. Was its deadly wound healed? Yes. How? By the sword of Charles Martel. See Gibbon, vol. 5, p. 291. The pope did exercise all the power of the Eastern emperor, by virtue of its restoration, until A. D. 800. See Putnam's Dictionary of Dates, p. 74. Then the pope did make an image to the beast, that had the wound by the sword and did live. He consummated the translation of the Empire from the Eastern to the Western. Thus he had two empires. An Eastern beast, and a Western beast. The first beast that had a wound by the sword and did live, and an image to that in the West. And none but the Roman Pontiff had power at that time to do it, for he was now the mouthpiece of Europe, by virtue of the power invested in him. See Gibbon vol. 5, pp. 40, 41. I understand the worshiping of the beast and his image, to be paying honor and flattery to poor, degraded, pampered emissaries of Satan.

Eighth.—At the conclusion of your article, you inquire, "Had the 1260 years' persecution of the leopard beast ended?" Yes. The leopard beast was not referred to in connection with the 1260, but the mouth that was given unto him. The prophet makes use of nearly the same words, and they, the saints, shall be given into his hand until a "time, times, and the dividing of time."

Ninth.—Your question, "Has the leopard beast yet to rise?" is fully met in a preceding part of this article. I did say that the two-horned beast should have a correspondence of duration and sovereignty, and facts themselves, in my opinion, demonstrate very clearly that opinion to be true.

Lastly, on the subject. The dragon did give his seat to the beast, according to historical testimony, A. D. 475. Then we have the leopard beast. The papacy did form a union with the political power somewhere in the early part of the fifth century, then the mouth. The Bishop soon began to speak, and exercise authority. And I now appeal to history, that it was by the assistance of the ruling imperial powers, or in the words of inspiration, the Heads of the leopard beast, that gave their power to the TYRANT PRIEST-KING OF ROME. That he was enabled to compel nations, kindreds, and tongues, and people, to either become Romanists, or they should be killed.

Tenth.—You remark that the leopard beast must yet arise, if there is any thing in the argument of performing miracles in his sight. The word declares he should have power to do his miracles in the sight of the beast; and papacy did profess to do miracles through the dark ages, and now professes to be the only true church. And the present pope, Pio Nino, who threatened in 1847 to come down from the chair of St. Peter and lead one million and a half of his subjects into the field of battle, makes his devotees believe he is the legitimate successor of St. Peter. I consider the mysterious power and influence that papacy has exerted in ages past, and especially now, when many are running to and fro, and knowledge is increasing, one of the most stupendous prodigies of the age. It is more miraculous, and more to be wondered at, in my estimation, than any of the wonders of witchcraft since the days of the witch of Endor.

I transmit to the Crisis an article on Rome. You may see something in that that may help you in the investigation of this very interesting subject.

Debate on Spiritualism.

A public debate came off at Woodstock, the county seat of McHenry Co., Ill., on Friday, Dec. 17th, 1858, between Elder Todd, of Crystal Lake, Ill., and Elder J. Howell, of Harvard, Ill. The question in discussion reads as follows: Resolved, that modern Spiritualism, as taught at the present time, is true, and also that the spirits of dead men do communicate with the living, Elder Todd taking the affirmative, and Elder J. Howell the negative. Elder Todd, who was formerly a preacher of the Methodist association, opened the debate with all confidence, considering himself the acknowleged champion of the West in the cause of Spiritualism. The discussion was held in the court house, a commodious building, which was densely filled with the people of Woodstock and the surrounding community far and near.

Elder Todd, after remarking that he had not come there with a lofty expectation of gaining a victory only, but for the purpose of defending the great and noble principles of truth which he had fondly embraced, stated for his first proposition that he repudiated the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, but as history he would receive it, and as the very best history of the ancients. From this the debate was turned into a discussion of the origin and authority of divine revelation. Elder Todd, however, confined himself to his first proposition, and labored hard, reasoning in almost every conceivable way, as if sound logic and good common sense were not worthy of commanding respect and admiration. His main object was to draw from such a starting point a triumphant conclusion, or, in other words, the overthrow of the Bible, the destruction of inspiration, the pulling down of christianity, and upon its ruins the erection of a throne of infidelity. For this evidently had to be accomplished, before modern Spiritualism, or which is more proper, that system of natural, physical, and progressive religion, could be established.

His argument upon this point consisted, firstly, in his own meagre ideas of the origin and authority of the Scriptures, and also in grossly misrepresenting and shamefully perverting the teachings they inculcate. Like a distinguished infidel of a former time, he begun with the opening pages of revelation, and so passing along through its several books, quoting disjointed passages, isolated from their true connections, endeavoring to prove in the first place, as from any other history, the fact of spiritual communications. For this purpose, and for this alone, did he receive the Bible as history, that he might establish the doctrine of spiritual manifestation and communication.

In the second place, he virtually impeached the same witness, by which he would prove spiritual communication, in his endeavors to overthrow inspiration; and in doing this, being a proficient in the business, he so plausibly and completely garbled and misrepresented the Bible, as to leave the impression upon the minds of those who were unacquainted with its teachings, that it was made up of one incongruous mass of ridiculous stories, although they had been taught to respect and admire the Bible from childhood. All at once, in the noonday of the 19th century, it is discovered to be but a sublime narrative, composed from the fanciful dreams of superstitious minds, who lived in the darkest ages of the receding past. Thus at a stroke, as it were, with a power of eloquence, and a flow of diction, and a flood of loose declamation, Elder Todd endeavored to demolish divine revelation. But notwithstanding his high weight of superficial knowledge, it could not stand before the real authenticated facts adduced by his opponent, Elder J. Howell. Neither could loose declamation resist the mighty and powerful arguments wielded upon the side of the negative, which had for a foundation, not mere metaphysical nonsense, but the genuine truths of history and the Bible.

Elder Howell first confined himself to the Bible, reviewing and closely examining all the passages quoted, or even alluded to by Elder Todd, at the same time openly exposing to the people the detestable dishonesty resorted to, and the unqualified ignorance indulged in, or the willful deception practiced, as the necessary prerequisites to the establishment of a science called modern Spiritualism. He also exhibited the beauty and harmony of its teachings, showing that the Bible was not the cause of all the diversity of opinion, as had been alleged by Elder Todd. In addition to this, an overwhelming flood of testimony was read from history, and from various other authors, showing the care by which the sacred books had been preserved; which concluded the first part of the debate. The second or last clause of the question was then taken up. Resolved, that the spirits of the departed dead do communicate with the living.

It is enough to say, without entering into the details of this part of the discussion, that Elder Todd made a complete failure. To prove the natural immortality of man, was to him an insurmountable difficulty. He frankly conceded before the audience that no proof could be derived from the Scriptures, and failing to prove it from any other source, the discussion consequently met a premature close.

It is thought by many that this discussion has resulted in good, at least one thing is certain, it has for the present buried the cause of Spiritualism in the city of Woodstock, and will undoubtedly prevent its further advancement in that community. Many of the Spiritualists realized the failure of the effort made by their champion, and two of their influentials acknowledged that their faith was shaken. Geo. Moyer.

Present Chastening.

"Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."

From the words in the above text the grand object of chastisements is exhibited. It may be very appropriately termed the balm which the great Physician suffers to be administered unto us in order to purify our hearts. Being conscious then of its use, let us not fret in any wise to do evil because of its bitterness, but welcome its continuance, believing, although we now endure it with tears, we shall by and by sup with joy. And let us introduce its healing qualities to our professing neighbors, whose very symptoms show plainly that they are ignorant of its use. They yet cherish revenge against that poor sinner which is bound in Satan's strong-holds, and that burdened oppressor, who is soon to be cut down like the grass, and wither like the green herb.

We may readily comprehend the necessity of being chastened if we will allow ourselves to consider with what tenacity we embrace, and perhaps often unconsciously idolize, the blessings we enjoy here. The bitter cup of affliction, sweetened with a mother's prayers for her children, was forced upon me at an early age. That cruel monster, death, entered my peaceful home and tore from my embrace the nearest and dearest tie of earth. In my grief, year after year, I was loudly called upon to open the door of my heart and bid the Savior welcome. I even saw by the eye of faith the King in his beauty, and while beholding him, I sang—

"Tongue cannot express
The sweet comfort and peace
Of a soul in its earliest love."

There was the proffered crown already coveted; on the other hand a cross. A still small voice said,—"Return to thine own house, and show how great things God hath done unto thee." My troubled spirit longed for wings like a dove, that I might fly away, far from the gaze of any human eye, to echo my prayers and thanksgivings alone to Him who claimed my supreme love. A long suffering God condescended to bear with one so unworthy as to shrink from duty, who was still cleaving to the things of the world. Afflictions brought me to see the vanity of all that is temporal. I said, I will arise and go to my Father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. And he saw me, when yet a great way off, and had compassion.

O may the Lord cease not to chasten whom he loveth, while an unholy thought is liable to take root and spring up within our hearts. Clarissa E. Cole.

The Soul.—No. 15.

In this number we commence the examination of psukee, the Greek word rendered soul in the New Testament. This word means the same in Greek, as nephesh in Hebrew. We have not been able to find in the Old Testament any intimation that nephesh stands for an immortal part in man. We should be surprised to find the New Testament contradicting the Old. We shall expect to find complete harmony.

The word psukee is the only word rendered soul in the New Testament, and occurs one hundred and five times, and is rendered in seven different ways.

In the Old Testament, we found nephesh was used primarily to express the whole being. Psukee is used in the same sense in the New Testament. "Then they that gladly received his word were baptized, and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls, (psukee.*) Acts 2: 41.—"And fear came upon every soul," (psukee.) Acts 2: 43.—"And it shall come to pass, that every soul, (psukee) that will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people." Acts 3: 23.—"Then sent Joseph, and called his father Jacob to him, and all his kindred, threescore and fifteen souls," (psukee.) Acts 7: 15.—"We were in all the ships, two hundred threescore and sixteen souls," (psukee.) Acts 27: 37.

In all the foregoing examples, it is very plain that psukee represents the whole person, and not a conscious existence separate from the man. Paul quotes from Gen. 2: 7, and says, "So it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul," (psukee.) 1 Cor. 15: 45. Observe, it does not read, he was made an immortal soul. When examining the Old Testament, we found that the phrase "living soul," applied to man in Gen. 2: 7, was precisely the same that was applied to all living creatures in the first chapter of Genesis, and in various other passages. We find psukee in the New Testament, agreeing perfectly with the use of nephesh in the Old Testament.—"And the second angel poured out his vial upon the sea; and it became as the blood of a dead man; and every living soul (psukee) died in the sea." Prov. 16: 3. In this last passage we see that every live creature in the sea is still called a "living soul," and there is no intimation in the Bible that the phrase "living soul," when applied to man, signifies an immortal being, any more than when applied to animals in the sea. As the word soul covers the whole man, who is said to be "mortal," it would seem strange if it should afterwards be used to represent an "immaterial," "uncompounded," "indivisible," "indestructible," "intangible" "immortal" man inside of what our Creator calls man, and one too of which he has given us no information whatever. We think it very plain, that the Bible addresses man in this world as an organized being, made of the dust of the ground, who will return to the same at death, where he will remain till the resurrection "at the last day."

We pass to the consideration of the second use of psukee in the New Testament. This harmonizes again perfectly with the corresponding word nephesh in the Hebrew Scriptures. Out of the one hundred and five times, it is rendered life and lives forty times, and applied indiscriminately to man and beast; but when thus rendered, it never means an organized being, but the "animated principle."

The word psukee first occurs in the New Testament, in Matt. 2: 20. The angel of the Lord says to Joseph, "Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel; for they are dead which sought the young child's "life." If life in the text represents an immortal conscious entity, or being, inside of the physical organism, which would escape from imprisonment soon as the organism is killed, then all their efforts to obtain that must be like running to catch lightning. Subsequently, this same wonderful personage "laid down his life (psukee) for us, and we ought to lay down our lives (psukee) for the brethren." 1 John 3: 16. Again, he says, "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life (psukee) for the sheep." John 10: 11. "I lay down my life (psukee) for the sheep." John 10: 15. "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life (psukee) that I might take it again." John 10: 17. It will be seen that the personal identity is represented by the pronoun I, instead of it, which stands for the word life; thus showing, most clearly, that the organism constitutes the identity, and not the psukee or "animated principle," which is common to all living beings on the planet.

When Paul was being carried to Rome, a very severe tempest was encountered, and all expected to find a watery grave; "but after long abstinence, Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, "Sirs, ... there shall be no loss of any man's life (psukee) among you, but of the ship." Acts 27: 21, 22. Did Paul mean to teach those sailors that each had an "immortal soul," and that not one of them should go to "hell torments," when he said there should "be no loss of any man's life (psukee)?

In speaking of Epaphroditus, Paul says, "For the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life (psukee) to supply your lack of service toward me." Phil. 2: 30. Does Paul mean that his brother Epaphroditus had an immortal soul which he did not regard or try to save?

"And the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life (psukee) died." Rev. 8: 9. Here the same word is applied to the creatures in the sea. We think there can be no doubt but that it means the same in the one example as the other; but in no case does it represent a conscious man existing separate from his physical organism.

* We give the simple form of the word, that it may be plainer to all.

Poultney.

The meetings in Poultney still continue with unabated interest. Forty-nine have been baptized, and others are waiting an opportunity. The list of converted and reclaimed contains eighty names. We have seldom seen converts more anxious to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. They seem resolved to believe no doctrine that is not proved from the Bible, so as to make harmony in the Scriptures. This is as it should be. We pray they may ever remain steadfast in their well chosen position. We are rejoiced to know they have come to the conclusion, that they have taken things for granted, on the assertion of others, full long enough. They have finally become satisfied that they can read and understand the Bible for themselves; that the Scriptures are not a revelation alone to the clergy, but to the common people.

We are often delighted with the joyful exclamations of those who have finally settled down in the belief that the Lord means what he says, and says what he means. They say the Bible is now translated out of a spiritual, dark and mysterious language, into plain and simple English. Now they can read and understand it. Every spare moment is spent with delight in perusing its pages, and yet it grows clearer and brighter as they advance. They wonder why they have not seen before, truth so plainly expressed; but when we consider the amount of theological rubbish, beneath which it has been buried, our surprise ceases. Very strong efforts are being made to patch up the rents, which the truth has made in the human creeds and popish fables of these last days, which are unsustained by one "thus saith the Lord." People begin to see that church creeds and Bible truth can not be made to harmonize, without doing violence to common sense and the word of the Lord; and it is comforting to find some who value truth more than reputation, and are willing to follow Christ, through evil as well as good report. My heart and hand are with you in this glorious cause. Brethren, onward!

"Anti-Eternal Torment."

The above is the heading of a fly sheet issued by Bro. Edwin Burnham, and should be scattered like forest leaves in all directions, and read by every body. Some ten thousand have been printed for free circulation in this city, and an earnest sensation is being awakened. If our brethren will send in their pledges amounting to fifteen or twenty dollars, another edition will be printed and forwarded to those who send the money. He can probably furnish from to two hundred for a dollar. Your neighbor should have a copy. Come, brethren, take hold of this work in earnest. Now is the time to work.

☞ We are requested to say that the new time argument prepared by Dr. Decker and others, showing the coming of the Lord next Spring, is unavoidably delayed in its issue till the first of next month, when orders addressed to Dr. A. Decker or A. Flavel, Newark, N. J., either with or without money, will receive prompt attention.

Yarmouth.

Wednesday, Jan. 29th, at 7 1-2 o'clock, we left the "City of Notions," and hastened over the iron way behind a fast iron horse, and in a few hours were quietly seated at the pleasant home of Bro. R. R. York, in Yarmouth, Me., eleven miles beyond Portland, and one hundred and thirty one from Boston. In the evening, we had a full house and an attentive audience in the Institute Hall. During the past year, Bro. York's labors have been much blessed, and a growing church has been planted. Soon after we met Bro. York, we learned that Dr. Lyon, a noted Spiritualist from New York, formerly a very successful Baptist preacher, was lecturing in the place, and Goliah-like, had defied the opponents of Spiritualism to meet him. Bro. York went to see him and arranged for a discussion. The Dr. said he could not decide till he had consulted his spirit friends. We suppose they gave permission, for he finally concluded to discuss the merits of Spiritual communications, in harmony with the following question:—"Is it possible, or probable, that spirits can or do communicate with those in the form?"

The following are some of the positions and statements of the Dr. "Mind and spirit are the same." "God is a positive principle." "Man is immortal." "Mind passes out of the form and continues to act." "Soul of man is the breath of God." "All who have good minds, that have investigated Spiritualism, have embraced it." "I know spirits come back and communicate." "Bible is not a finality to me."—"I will prove Spiritualism so fully that you cannot unclinch it for one hundred years." "The same works are done now as in the days of Christ." "The Old Testament was written when men were ignorant." "No such thing as death." "Nothing in nature dies." "The weight of evidence in the Bible is against the immortality of the soul." The resurrection is fabulous." "If man is not immortal, he is not dependent on God." "Can't prove that Jesus Christ said anything that is in the New Testament." "The Devil more humane than the God of the Bible." "I am trying to defend the Devil." The foregoing, are some of the sayings of the Dr., during the first evening's discussion. He poured contempt on the Bible, its doctrines, and its author; but the truth triumphed, and the good old Book stands like the rock Gibraltar, when assailed by a boy's pop-gun. The Dr. admitted, if he takes the Bible literally, he must come to the same conclusion as his opponent—that the dead are unconscious.

The second evening, the Dr. made many more expressions like those already mentioned; such as, "The God worshiped to day, by the churches, is inferior to the Devil." "If these are spirits of demons, they will soon have the world." "There is no death." "Time to throw away the Bible." "Spirits come to convince us of the great truth of immortality." "Man was made an immortal being." "Hebrews not a creditable book." "The spirit has a separate organized form, and we can show the material of which the spirit is made." "The Bible was never heard of till B. C. 628." "I don't receive the Bible as testimony on any thing." "There is no sin." "I can raise the dead as much as they ever were raised." "The resurrection of the body is one of the greatest of all chimeras." "Jesus' body was never raised," &c. &c.

Although the Dr. promised to clinch Spiritualism so that it could not be "unclinched for one hundred years," we think he did not even succeed in getting his nails through so that they could be clinched. Some who were quite in sympathy with the Dr. and the sentiments advanced before the discussion, are now entirely changed in their relation to Spiritualism. We think the cause of truth has been much strengthened and advanced by the discussion. We are fully satisfied that Spiritualism is the great antagonist against christianity, God and the Bible, and that its only foundation is the immortality of the soul.

The Dear Departed.

Beloved Friends:—It has become my painful duty to announce to you the death of our long cherished, and most excellent mother in Israel, Sr. Sarah Chaplin. She is laid away by tender hands and aching hearts, to await her nuptial morn, when the Bridegroom shall descend to claim his bride from the enemy's power, and take her to himself, without spot, to enjoy his presence forever.

She yielded up her breath in the few last moments of the closing year—a type of her faith; for she had long believed that earth's sad night, numbered by thousands of bitter years, is about to close, and the new era of millennial glory to dawn upon the world. She, with her faithful companion, most heartily welcomed the proclamation of the kingdom nigh in '42, opened their hearts and house for the reception of those who believed and proclaimed the message. Indeed, it was there that we first heard the glad tidings, and heard it talked of in faith and love. Never can I forget my first visit to their consecrated house in that year. To hear the coming of Christ spoken of as an impending event, with perfect ecstasies of joy, was so new to me, that I sat astonished, and could say nothing. But, bless the Lord, while I mused the fire burned; my tongue was loosed, and I was made to rejoice with them. Yes, and for sixteen long years have we had the privilege of witnessing the steadfastness of their faith in the gospel of the Son of God. How oft during this period has my poor heart, yea, and the hearts of God's dear children generally, in this region, been comforted in meeting at their house to worship God; and how sad the thought that we can no more have that privilege! That we shall no more meet her friendly smile, nor partake of her overflowing hospitalities. It was her heart's delight, yea, her meat and drink, to wait upon the children of her heavenly Master. O this is a sore bereavement to us all! She was emphatically the example of religion here. Indeed, dear friends, as mother Chaplin's Obituary, I refer you to that inspired account of a virtuous woman, contained in the last chapter of Proverbs, beginning at the 10th verse. She was in every respect the best personification of that I ever saw. She has been striving to walk in the narrow path for nearly fifty years. She was seventy-one at her decease. The "enemy" found her, as she had lived, with her armor on. The praises of God seemed her "vital breath, her native air." So long had she flourished in the garden of grace, that she seemed one in spirit with the heavenly chanters. All glory to God! it was heavenly to be at her house, and in her society.

Their native place was in the vicinity of Boston; but at an early day, they emigrated to the West, where they have sustained the honorable position of pioneers, both in settlement and in religion.

Dear friends, those of you who have a sympathy to spare from your own sorrows in this sin-stricken world, let it flow for our aged brother in Jesus. The habits of fifty-one years last Oct. 11th, are now broken up. The hope that has cheered and comforted him that length of time, is now desolate. The true and faithful heart that has so long beat for his comfort, is now still in death. Those hands that have so long ministered to his comfort, are now powerless in the grave; and that cheerful voice which has been his music for so many years, is now hushed forever, and he is left to finish his earthly pilgrimage alone. And if it all ended here, how dark the picture. But glory be to God! "life and immortality" are brought to light in the gospel. A triumphant "victory"! Victory over sin, death, and the grave, awaits the children of God. And we which are alive and remain to the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent those that are asleep; for, when the Lord himself shall descend, they shall arise first; then we shall be changed and caught up together with them, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. These words are our comfort; and may they be applied as healing balm by the great Physician, to the wounded spirit of our bereaved brother, and to all who are in like affliction. E. S. Willard.

☞ It is strange that the experience of so many ages should not make us judge more solidly of the present and of the future, so as to take proper measures in the one for the other. We doat upon this world as if it were never to have an end, and we neglect the next as if it were never to have a beginning.—Fenelon.

Debate on Spiritualism.

A public debate came off at Woodstock, the county seat of McHenry Co., Ill., on Friday, Dec. 17th, 1858, between Elder Todd, of Crystal Lake, Ill., and Elder J. Howell, of Harvard, Ill. The question in discussion reads as follows: Resolved, that modern Spiritualism, as taught at the present time, is true, and also that the spirits of dead men do communicate with the living, Elder Todd taking the affirmative, and Elder J. Howell the negative. Elder Todd, who was formerly a preacher of the Methodist association, opened the debate with all confidence, considering himself the acknowleged champion of the West in the cause of Spiritualism. The discussion was held in the court house, a commodious building, which was densely filled with the people of Woodstock and the surrounding community far and near.

Elder Todd, after remarking that he had not come there with a lofty expectation of gaining a victory only, but for the purpose of defending the great and noble principles of truth which he had fondly embraced, stated for his first proposition that he repudiated the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, but as history he would receive it, and as the very best history of the ancients. From this the debate was turned into a discussion of the origin and authority of divine revelation. Elder Todd, however, confined himself to his first proposition, and labored hard, reasoning in almost every conceivable way, as if sound logic and good common sense were not worthy of commanding respect and admiration. His main object was to draw from such a starting point a triumphant conclusion, or, in other words, the overthrow of the Bible, the destruction of inspiration, the pulling down of christianity, and upon its ruins the erection of a throne of infidelity. For this evidently had to be accomplished, before modern Spiritualism, or which is more proper, that system of natural, physical, and progressive religion, could be established.

His argument upon this point consisted, firstly, in his own meagre ideas of the origin and authority of the Scriptures, and also in grossly misrepresenting and shamefully perverting the teachings they inculcate. Like a distinguished infidel of a former time, he begun with the opening pages of revelation, and so passing along through its several books, quoting disjointed passages, isolated from their true connections, endeavoring to prove in the first place, as from any other history, the fact of spiritual communications. For this purpose, and for this alone, did he receive the Bible as history, that he might establish the doctrine of spiritual manifestation and communication.

In the second place, he virtually impeached the same witness, by which he would prove spiritual communication, in his endeavors to overthrow inspiration; and in doing this, being a proficient in the business, he so plausibly and completely garbled and misrepresented the Bible, as to leave the impression upon the minds of those who were unacquainted with its teachings, that it was made up of one incongruous mass of ridiculous stories, although they had been taught to respect and admire the Bible from childhood. All at once, in the noonday of the 19th century, it is discovered to be but a sublime narrative, composed from the fanciful dreams of superstitious minds, who lived in the darkest ages of the receding past. Thus at a stroke, as it were, with a power of eloquence, and a flow of diction, and a flood of loose declamation, Elder Todd endeavored to demolish divine revelation. But notwithstanding his high weight of superficial knowledge, it could not stand before the real authenticated facts adduced by his opponent, Elder J. Howell. Neither could loose declamation resist the mighty and powerful arguments wielded upon the side of the negative, which had for a foundation, not mere metaphysical nonsense, but the genuine truths of history and the Bible.

Elder Howell first confined himself to the Bible, reviewing and closely examining all the passages quoted, or even alluded to by Elder Todd, at the same time openly exposing to the people the detestable dishonesty resorted to, and the unqualified ignorance indulged in, or the willful deception practiced, as the necessary prerequisites to the establishment of a science called modern Spiritualism. He also exhibited the beauty and harmony of its teachings, showing that the Bible was not the cause of all the diversity of opinion, as had been alleged by Elder Todd. In addition to this, an overwhelming flood of testimony was read from history, and from various other authors, showing the care by which the sacred books had been preserved; which concluded the first part of the debate. The second or last clause of the question was then taken up. Resolved, that the spirits of the departed dead do communicate with the living.

It is enough to say, without entering into the details of this part of the discussion, that Elder Todd made a complete failure. To prove the natural immortality of man, was to him an insurmountable difficulty. He frankly conceded before the audience that no proof could be derived from the Scriptures, and failing to prove it from any other source, the discussion consequently met a premature close.

It is thought by many that this discussion has resulted in good, at least one thing is certain, it has for the present buried the cause of Spiritualism in the city of Woodstock, and will undoubtedly prevent its further advancement in that community. Many of the Spiritualists realized the failure of the effort made by their champion, and two of their influentials acknowledged that their faith was shaken. Geo. Moyer.

Subsequently, this same wonderful personage "laid down his life (psukee) for us, and we ought to lay down our lives (psukee) for the brethren." 1 John 3: 16. Again, he says, "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life (psukee) for the sheep." John 10: 11. "I lay down my life (psukee) for the sheep." John 10: 15. "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life (psukee) that I might take it again." John 10: 17. It will be seen that the personal identity is represented by the pronoun I, instead of it, which stands for the word life; thus showing, most clearly, that the organism constitutes the identity, and not the psukee or "animated principle," which is common to all living beings on the planet.

When Paul was being carried to Rome, a very severe tempest was encountered, and all expected to find a watery grave; "but after long abstinence, Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, "Sirs, ... there shall be no loss of any man's life (psukee) among you, but of the ship." Acts 27: 21, 22. Did Paul mean to teach those sailors that each had an "immortal soul," and that not one of them should go to "hell torments," when he said there should "be no loss of any man's life (psukee)?

In speaking of Epaphroditus, Paul says, "For the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life (psukee) to supply your lack of service toward me." Phil. 2: 30. Does Paul mean that his brother Epaphroditus had an immortal soul which he did not regard or try to save?

"And the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life (psukee) died." Rev. 8: 9. Here the same word is applied to the creatures in the sea. We think there can be no doubt but that it means the same in the one example as the other; but in no case does it represent a conscious man existing separate from his physical organism.

* We give the simple form of the word, that it may be plainer to all.

Poultney.

The meetings in Poultney still continue with unabated interest. Forty-nine have been baptized, and others are waiting an opportunity. The list of converted and reclaimed contains eighty names. We have seldom seen converts more anxious to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. They seem resolved to believe no doctrine that is not proved from the Bible, so as to make harmony in the Scriptures. This is as it should be. We pray they may ever remain steadfast in their well chosen position. We are rejoiced to know they have come to the conclusion, that they have taken things for granted, on the assertion of others, full long enough. They have finally become satisfied that they can read and understand the Bible for themselves; that the Scriptures are not a revelation alone to the clergy, but to the common people.

We are often delighted with the joyful exclamations of those who have finally settled down in the belief that the Lord means what he says, and says what he means. They say the Bible is now translated out of a spiritual, dark and mysterious language, into plain and simple English. Now they can read and understand it. Every spare moment is spent with delight in perusing its pages, and yet it grows clearer and brighter as they advance. They wonder why they have not seen before, truth so plainly expressed; but when we consider the amount of theological rubbish, beneath which it has been buried, our surprise ceases. Very strong efforts are being made to patch up the rents, which the truth has made in the human creeds and popish fables of these last days, which are unsustained by one "thus saith the Lord." People begin to see that church creeds and Bible truth can not be made to harmonize, without doing violence to common sense and the word of the Lord; and it is comforting to find some who value truth more than reputation, and are willing to follow Christ, through evil as well as good report. My heart and hand are with you in this glorious cause. Brethren, onward!

"Anti-Eternal Torment."

The above is the heading of a fly sheet issued by Bro. Edwin Burnham, and should be scattered like forest leaves in all directions, and read by every body. Some ten thousand have been printed for free circulation in this city, and an earnest sensation is being awakened. If our brethren will send in their pledges amounting to fifteen or twenty dollars, another edition will be printed and forwarded to those who send the money. He can probably furnish from to two hundred for a dollar. Your neighbor should have a copy. Come, brethren, take hold of this work in earnest. Now is the time to work.

☞ We are requested to say that the new time argument prepared by Dr. Decker and others, showing the coming of the Lord next Spring, is unavoidably delayed in its issue till the first of next month, when orders addressed to Dr. A. Decker or A. Flavel, Newark, N. J., either with or without money, will receive prompt attention.

Yarmouth.

Wednesday, Jan. 29th, at 7 1-2 o'clock, we left the "City of Notions," and hastened over the iron way behind a fast iron horse, and in a few hours were quietly seated at the pleasant home of Bro. R. R. York, in Yarmouth, Me., eleven miles beyond Portland, and one hundred and thirty one from Boston. In the evening, we had a full house and an attentive audience in the Institute Hall. During the past year, Bro. York's labors have been much blessed, and a growing church has been planted. Soon after we met Bro. York, we learned that Dr. Lyon, a noted Spiritualist from New York, formerly a very successful Baptist preacher, was lecturing in the place, and Goliah-like, had defied the opponents of Spiritualism to meet him. Bro. York went to see him and arranged for a discussion. The Dr. said he could not decide till he had consulted his spirit friends. We suppose they gave permission, for he finally concluded to discuss the merits of Spiritual communications, in harmony with the following question:—"Is it possible, or probable, that spirits can or do communicate with those in the form?"

The following are some of the positions and statements of the Dr. "Mind and spirit are the same." "God is a positive principle." "Man is immortal." "Mind passes out of the form and continues to act." "Soul of man is the breath of God." "All who have good minds, that have investigated Spiritualism, have embraced it." "I know spirits come back and communicate." "Bible is not a finality to me."—"I will prove Spiritualism so fully that you cannot unclinch it for one hundred years." "The same works are done now as in the days of Christ." "The Old Testament was written when men were ignorant." "No such thing as death." "Nothing in nature dies." "The weight of evidence in the Bible is against the immortality of the soul." The resurrection is fabulous." "If man is not immortal, he is not dependent on God." "Can't prove that Jesus Christ said anything that is in the New Testament." "The Devil more humane than the God of the Bible." "I am trying to defend the Devil." The foregoing are some of the sayings of the Dr., during the first evening's discussion. He poured contempt on the Bible, its doctrines, and its author; but the truth triumphed, and the good old Book stands like the rock Gibraltar, when assailed by a boy's pop-gun. The Dr. admitted, if he takes the Bible literally, he must come to the same conclusion as his opponent—that the dead are unconscious.

The second evening, the Dr. made many more expressions like those already mentioned; such as, "The God worshiped to day, by the churches, is inferior to the Devil." "If these are spirits of demons, they will soon have the world." "There is no death." "Time to throw away the Bible." "Spirits come to convince us of the great truth of immortality." "Man was made an immortal being." "Hebrews not a creditable book." "The spirit has a separate organized form, and we can show the material of which the spirit is made." "The Bible was never heard of till B. C. 628." "I don't receive the Bible as testimony on any thing." "There is no sin." "I can raise the dead as much as they ever were raised." "The resurrection of the body is one of the greatest of all chimeras." "Jesus' body was never raised," &c. &c.

Although the Dr. promised to clinch Spiritualism so that it could not be "unclinched for one hundred years," we think he did not even succeed in getting his nails through so that they could be clinched. Some who were quite in sympathy with the Dr. and the sentiments advanced before the discussion, are now entirely changed in their relation to Spiritualism. We think the cause of truth has been much strengthened and advanced by the discussion. We are fully satisfied that Spiritualism is the great antagonist against christianity, God and the Bible, and that its only foundation is the immortality of the soul.

For the Crisis.

The Dear Departed.

Beloved Friends:—It has become my painful duty to announce to you the death of our long cherished, and most excellent mother in Israel, Sr. Sarah Chaplin. She is laid away by tender hands and aching hearts, to await her nuptial morn, when the Bridegroom shall descend to claim his bride from the enemy's power, and take her to himself, without spot, to enjoy his presence forever.

She yielded up her breath in the few last moments of the closing year—a type of her faith; for she had long believed that earth's sad night, numbered by thousands of bitter years, is about to close, and the new era of millennial glory to dawn upon the world. She, with her faithful companion, most heartily welcomed the proclamation of the kingdom nigh in '42, opened their hearts and house for the reception of those who believed and proclaimed the message. Indeed, it was there that we first heard the glad tidings, and heard it talked of in faith and love. Never can I forget my first visit to their consecrated house in that year. To hear the coming of Christ spoken of as an impending event, with perfect ecstasies of joy, was so new to me, that I sat astonished, and could say nothing. But, bless the Lord, while I mused the fire burned; my tongue was loosed, and I was made to rejoice with them. Yes, and for sixteen long years have we had the privilege of witnessing the steadfastness of their faith in the gospel of the Son of God. How oft during this period has my poor heart, yea, and the hearts of God's dear children generally, in this region, been comforted in meeting at their house to worship God; and how sad the thought that we can no more have that privilege! That we shall no more meet her friendly smile, nor partake of her overflowing hospitalities. It was her heart's delight, yea, her meat and drink, to wait upon the children of her heavenly Master. O this is a sore bereavement to us all! She was emphatically the example of religion here. Indeed, dear friends, as mother Chaplin's Obituary, I refer you to that inspired account of a virtuous woman, contained in the last chapter of Proverbs, beginning at the 10th verse. She was in every respect the best personification of that I ever saw. She has been striving to walk in the narrow path for nearly fifty years. She was seventy-one at her decease. The "enemy" found her, as she had lived, with her armor on. The praises of God seemed her "vital breath, her native air." So long had she flourished in the garden of grace, that she seemed one in spirit with the heavenly chanters. All glory to God! it was heavenly to be at her house, and in her society.

Their native place was in the vicinity of Boston; but at an early day, they emigrated to the West, where they have sustained the honorable position of pioneers, both in settlement and in religion.

Dear friends, those of you who have a sympathy to spare from your own sorrows in this sin-stricken world, let it flow for our aged brother in Jesus. The habits of fifty-one years last Oct. 11th, are now broken up. The hope that has cheered and comforted him that length of time, is now desolate. The true and faithful heart that has so long beat for his comfort, is now still in death. Those hands that have so long ministered to his comfort, are now powerless in the grave; and that cheerful voice which has been his music for so many years, is now hushed forever, and he is left to finish his earthly pilgrimage alone. And if it all ended here, how dark the picture. But glory be to God! "life and immortality" are brought to light in the gospel. A triumphant "victory"! Victory over sin, death, and the grave, awaits the children of God. And we which are alive and remain to the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent those that are asleep; for, when the Lord himself shall descend, they shall arise first; then we shall be changed and caught up together with them, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. These words are our comfort; and may they be applied as healing balm by the great Physician, to the wounded spirit of our bereaved brother, and to all who are in like affliction. E. S. Willard.

☞ It is strange that the experience of so many ages should not make us judge more solidly of the present and of the future, so as to take proper measures in the one for the other. We doat upon this world as if it were never to have an end, and we neglect the next as if it were never to have a beginning.—Fenelon.

From Sr. E. S. Fenn.

Bro. Grant:—I feel greatly encouraged, while I have endeavored to hold up my light before the world, in finding that there is still a saving power attending the preaching of the gospel of the Son of God. I am still waiting for the fulfillment of the promise made to the fathers; and as they without us could not be made perfect, my aching heart finds consolation in the indulgence of the hope that I may be permitted to share in the promised rest, which I trust will soon be given to the weary. I think I fully realize that I am a pilgrim and stranger, but gratitude fills my heart while I know that I am not left to wander in a wilderness world without a guide. Were it so, I am sure I could never select the right way from among so many winding paths. While one is crying "this way", and another "that," it is truly cheering to know that the good Shepherd has said "my sheep hear my voice and they follow me." And he not only promises protection from the devouring wolves, but he says, "I give unto them eternal life."

Hence it is that with the groaning creation I am panting for the breezes which shall waft o'er the delectable fields, the news, that disease is forever banished; death, the cruel tyrant, slain, Eden restored, Jesus owned as conqueror over all, and adored by saints throughout the earth, who live, nevermore to die.

O! shall I e'er behold the face
Of Him who bids me come?
And can I e'er be saved by grace?
And will He say, "well done?"

Methinks I could not e'en attempt
At first, the song of praise,
Until I'd gazed, with lingering look,
Upon his lovely face.

But when in silent thought I'd viewed
His enemies all slain,
My every power should then be waked
To join the rapturous strain.

My lungs, no longer weak and faint,
Inhale the balmy breeze;
My weary feet, no longer bound,
Bear me away with ease.

Away amid the busy throng
I'd hie me to the grove,
I'd taste the fruit of life's fair tree,—
Its healing powers prove.

Then like the hart with joyous bound
I'd run—Life's stream to taste,—
I'd give one plunge into the wave,
To greet the saints, then haste.

While loudest of them all I'd sing
The song which Moses sang,
And while the heavenly arches ring,
I'd add that of the Lamb.

May God grant that what I now anticipate may prove a reality. Thus I remain your sister in the hope of the gospel,

E. S. Fenn.

Letter from Bro. J. Merriam.

Bro. Grant:—The refreshing, and truly excellent letter of Sister Mathewson to H. L. H., in the Crisis of Jan. 12th, recalled to my mind the circumstances of my former experience, in being translated from darkness to light, in relation to the personal and glorious second advent of Christ, and to which I feel child-like enough to refer. It may, perhaps, furnish a crumb for the children, as they gather around your weekly board. I had been very orthodoxically trained; "after the straitest sect of our religion," I lived a Congregationalist; supposing we were the people, and that wisdom should die with us. I believed in a temporal millennium as firmly as I did in a judgment to come. But, oh! how distorted and perverted were my ideas of Scripture truth! But when the scene was reversed, and the light broke upon my darkened vision, I felt baptized into a glory which I had never before discovered, and which I deemed to be appropriately termed, "ADVENT GLORY."

In the fall of '42, Bro. T. M. Preble, in connection with other laborers, visited that section of Maine in which I then resided. Their campmeetings were to me like battle grounds in the distance, whence I could distinctly hear the roar of artillery which seemed to make me tremble in every joint. I at first esteemed it profound ignorance, thinking everybody ought to know that, at all events, Christ could not come under a thousand years. But I soon marked two points, viz., that those who advocated the coming of Christ, possessed the spirit of meekness, gentleness and love; while their opponents were contemptuous and overbearing. In the one I thought I could see the image of Christ; in the other, that of Satan. I also felt in my own breast, that my feelings were roiled whenever I attempted to utter a word against the subject. This closed my lips hermetically; but I was a close observer of the movements. Being unprepared for the judgment, I felt like one who was being pressed onward gradually and irresistibly toward a devouring fire from which there was no escape. The earth was a tomb, and my dwelling-place a prison. At length I began to read, commencing with Bro. Fitch' "Reasons for believing that the advent of our Lord will take place in or about 1843." I then seemed like a person in an apartment made perfectly dark, and having the shutters thrown open, so that the full blazing sunbeams struck instantly upon his vision. I can never describe the clearness and vividness of the light which then shone through my entire being.

Subsequently, I took up Prof. Stewart's "Hints on Prophecy," in which he endeavored to show that the days spoken of in Daniel and John were to be accounted literal days. Having regarded him as an intellectual giant, I feared that, Sampson-like, he might shake down that edifice in which I had now become so much interested. But upon examination it seemed founded upon a rock. While the edifice he erected with consummate skill, like a castle built for ages, fell to ruins, being founded on the sand; for I saw that the last verse of Daniel's prophecy contained the promise that he should stand in his lot at the end of the days. This, like a little streamlet, washed away the sand, and the edifice fell. All this was a confirmation of my hope.

Soon after, as I was passing from the place of my residence to an adjoining town, I repaired to the woods, in order to pray more particularly for a witness of the spirit in relation to the truthfulness of the doctrine. Here I spent hours in fasting and prayer. At length, although unimpassioned and deliberate, my hope seemed confirmed. Then rising from my knees, I returned to the highway; but just at this time, having discovered a by-path, as if the Lord had taken me by the hand, I was impressed to follow it, when, all at once, and to my surprise, my eye lighted on a number of graves. Being naturally possessed of a temperament nervous and sensitive in the extreme, I had never up to that moment of my life experienced pleasurable emotions, or one congenial feeling, at the sight of the dead, the shroud, or the grave. Far otherwise. But at this moment all the sensibilities of my nature were completely reversed, the laws of my being seemed suspended. Those graves were enveloped in a sort of celestial light and beauty that filled me with amazement. Indeed such were my emotions, that I almost shrink from attempting to describe the indescribable, or to express the inexpressible.

It seemed to me as if the massive bolts of the grave were sundered, and the almost opening portals of the tomb were preparing the way for the inmates to come forth, rejoicing in the light of everlasting day. That Being, whose prerogative is to announce the jubilee with the signal blast of his trumpet, seemed already over my head, and prepared to give the summons; waiting, as it were, the great bell of time to strike the hour of the resurrection morn. I stood thus at the vestibule of the charnel house, but its apartments were filled with the glory of a living light. I stood alone as in the ante-chamber of the dead; but those dead were being clad with immortal vestments, and ready to burst forth from their prison-house into the glories of a new and blessed life. Tears involuntarily gushed from my streaming eyes; acclamations of joy and praise proceeded from lips hitherto unaccustomed to shout; songs burst forth from the depths of my heart, and as I continued to gaze upon those dormitories of the dead, my emotions of unutterable delight seemed to rise and swell, till the laws of my physical being also seemed suspended, the weight of the system seeming so small, that it needed but little more power to have translated me rejoicing into the heavens. Thus weeping, praying, rejoicing, shouting, singing and praising God, I walked round and round those graves, and you may be assured that it was with slow and reluctant step I retired from that enchanting spot.

Thus God marked eternally a crisis in my moral history, and a line of demarkation was drawn between my present and former position, which is like that impassable "gulf;" and I feel the force of that scripture which saith, "Let them return unto you, but return ye not unto them." I am, therefore an Adventist from a double reason, both necessity and choice. Since embracing the faith, I have felt my soul at times filled with the energies of a new life. I love all men, and sympathize with all so far as lies in my power; but were I to abandon this hope, and to amalgamate with the despisers of the same, the vitality of my spiritual life would be extinct, my candle put out, and I feel that I should plunge into the abyss of perdition.

Since, therefore, in our age there has been a special development of divine light and truth, calling us to the specific work of heralding the proclamation that shall usher in the reign of our coming King, it seems to me that the movement is worthy of a distinctive and appropriate name. Therefore I heartily concur with many others in the position taken by Sr. Mathewson. Yours for the truth,

Jonas Merriam.

For the Crisis.

Queries.

Will some brother answer the following questions through the Crisis?

1. Does regeneration, or generation by the Holy Spirit, precede the new birth?
2. Is there any analogy between the generation and birth of the natural and spiritual man?
3. What time in the christian's life does his eternal life commence, or its principles in embryo?
4. What constitutes the birth of the Spirit? J. Lewis.

Reply.

Dear Bro.:—Your questions in regard to the new birth are of much importance to the Bible student, and a right understanding of the subject will give much light upon the plan of salvation, and show the beauty and harmony of divine revelation. I will endeavor to answer your questions according to the Scriptures.

1. To regenerate, is to reproduce that which has been generated; consequently, the new birth is the regeneration, or the reproduction of the Man that has been generated.

2. Yes: the natural man is begotten by the seed of man; the spiritual man by the seed of God. James 1: 18.—"Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures." Peter calls the word of God the incorruptible seed. 1 Pet. 1: 23. The natural birth produces the natural man into the natural world; the new birth, or regeneration, *re*produces the man into the spiritual, or world to come. Thus we have a perfect analogy.

3. When he is "begotten by the word of truth, or receives the word of eternal life in faith." "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." John 6: 63.

4. Man is begotten of the Spirit, by the word of truth, when he is converted, and receives the spirit of adoption, whereby he cries, Abba, Father. "Every one that loveth is born (begotten, Macknight) of God." 1 John 4: 7. [Born should be rendered begotten in every place in John's epistles, and is so rendered by Macknight, and in the new translation of the American Bible Union.] The object of begetting is to save the man, and give him eternal life, and when the seed (word of God) that is incorruptible, has finished its work in embryo, it produces a man of the same nature as itself; that is, an incorruptible man, that fadeth not away; consequently, we look for the incorruptible nature at the resurrection of the just, when this mortal shall put on immortality, this corruptible put on incorruptibility. Then the man is regenerated—reproduced—born again by the Spirit—raised from the dead by the Spirit of God—consequently the new birth is the resurrection of the just to eternal life.—"Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."—John 3: 3. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit."—John 3: 8. It does not read, so is the operation of the Spirit upon the man, but so is every one (man) that is born of the Spirit. In the immortal state we shall be like Christ, to range the fields of the new creation, without getting weary; shall not need the chariots of Nahum to travel with, but will is to be power, to go wherever the Spirit leads. Christ, the first born from the dead, is to be "everlasting Father" when he has his children born from the dead to everlasting life. Then a "nation will be born in a day." Oh, glorious hope! let us cherish the incorruptible seed in our hearts, that we may have the incorruptible nature at the resurrection of the dead.

Foreign News.

New York, Jan. 19.

Steamship City of Washington, from Liverpool at 11 A. M., of the 5th inst., arrived at her dock here about 7 30 this morning.

At the Emperor's levee, on New Year's day, Napoleon addressed the following words to the Austrian Minister:

"I regret our relations with your government are not so good as they were, but I request you to tell the Emperor my personal feelings for him have not changed."

The emphatic tone of the Emperor, and his animated gestures, attracted the attention of the assembled diplomatic corps.

The Bourse was closed till the 3d, but on opening quite a panic prevailed, the decline in funds being fully one per cent.

The London Exchange sympathizes with Paris—the decline at one time being nearly one-half per cent. The market closed flat.

At Vienna also a panic prevailed, under the rumor that Austria will send troops to Belgrade.

Italy is in a very unsettled state, particularly Lombardy. News from all parts is pregnant with alarm. The steps taken in Lombardy are almost tantamount to a state of siege.

The London Times, reviewing the recent official correspondence on Central American affairs, thinks the American government and its officers are pushing the matter very far indeed.

For the Crisis.

The New Year.

Various are the emotions and considerations which the termination and commencement of a fleeting year suggest to every considerate mind.

What gratitude is demanded toward the Father of mercies for innumerable favors to unprofitable servants! What humility and penitence in view of precious moments, and opportunities for doing good, misimproved. What holy joy, in the view of the nearer approach of that glorious appearing of our blessed Lord, when he shall take us to himself, to be with him and to be "like him" forever; when we shall love him more, and serve him better.

At such a season, the apostolic injunction to every professor of the christian religion, and the christian's hope, is peculiarly appropriate:—"Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Christ Jesus is in you, except ye be reprobates?" 2 Cor. 13: 5. If among the first professors of our holy religion, when there were so many more barriers to a false profession than at present, there were those whose hearts were not right with God—those who "loved this present world"—those who, notwithstanding their baptism, were "in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity;" how much more danger now exists of coming short of entering into the "rest" which remaineth "for the people of God."

An awful disappointment, doubtless, awaits many a professor of this era, when there is so much of the form of godliness, and so little of its spirit and power. Let each one seriously ask, "Lord, is it I?"

What tremendous realities of the future are connected with probationary time! Dear brethren in the Lord, the past is gone forever. Not a misimproved moment can we recall. The past actions of accountable man are sealed up to the judgment of the great day. But, by the grace of God, we may improve the precious remnant of our time more to his glory, to our own eternal well-being, and to that of our fellow men. God help us to resolve, with more decision of purpose, in his strength to do so. O that we may feel more of the blessed influence of a Savior's dying love, crucifying the flesh with all its affections and lusts. O that we may have more of the Spirit of Him who wept over a sinful, perishing world, and denied himself to save them from the wrath of God.

Dear brethren, the coming of the Master to call us to give account of our stewardship, "hasteth greatly." O that the present year may witness more fidelity to Him who bore our sins in his own body on the tree. As those who are not our own, as those who have nothing but what we have received, (except our sins,) let us now, in the strength of our great High Priest, (whose grace is sufficient for us,) consecrate our time, talents, property, hearts and lives to his reasonable and delightful service. Then will an abundant entrance soon be ministered to us into his everlasting kingdom.

Yours in the patient waiting for Jesus Christ, HENRY GREW.

Item of Interest.

BRO. GRANT:—Whilst laboring in St. Clair Co., Mich., a few weeks since, I found a little society of Germans, who are of "like precious faith;" many of them having left their own country to find some place where they could speak freely of the things pertaining to Christ and his kingdom, and worship God without molestation. They did not know that there were any of like faith in this country, who were looking and waiting for that same Jesus to come again. And they rejoiced when told that there were those who were proclaiming the same doctrines, for believing and speaking which, they were persecuted in their own country. And they have to suffer some persecutions now; but they feel to thank God, and take courage. They request the prayers of the brethren and sisters scattered abroad, in their behalf, that they may "be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord;" and with all the redeemed, be granted an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord, when the Lord "will turn to the people a pure language."

For the Crisis.

Yielding to God.

"For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me." John 6: 38.

Such was the Savior's character. Absolute submission to the will of God was his law of action, his ruling, all-governing principle. It made him willing to become a babe in the lowly manger; it drew forth his tender soul, in acts of love and pity, towards lost, miserable man, all his life long, while he "went about doing good," both to the bodies and souls of men; and finally, it led him up Calvary, there to pour out his life's blood for you and me. No selfishness or self-will ever found a lodgment in that benevolent heart. What a contrast to the self-seeking, self-willed, depraved children of Adam! Brother, sister, does it not put you to the blush? O for a giving up of our own hateful, narrow-minded selfishness, and a transforming into the lovely, self-denying, disinterested spirit of our dear Redeemer!

Now a christian is one that is Christlike. It is not merely one who may be fluent in prayer and exhortation, or who may be highly esteemed among men as a saint. Such may, or may not be christians. It is one who has learned to submit his own will to the will of God, as did our blessed Master. When everything goes according to one's mind, he is calm and peaceful as a summer's eve. And he is so devoted, he will pray, and exhort, and talk on holiness. O, what zeal, what fervor! "Surely," think you, "such a one is a saint, and that of no ordinary character." But you touch him. Let something come along, in the providence of God, that shall try his unbroken, unsubdued will, and there is the "old man," in full shape. His religion is all gone. He will not submit to that. Why should he? "It is not duty," he reasons with himself; and Satan stands ready to suggest a plenty of reasons why his own way is the right one. At other times, he will fret and chafe, if things do not go to suit him. He is an utter stranger to meek, lamb-like, christian resignation. Such a character can never enter the kingdom. This disposition to have its own way, more like that of a lion, or a tiger, than of a christian, must here be tamed down to that of the lamb, or such an one will knock in vain for admittance at the gate of heaven. It matters not what may be such an one's professions; he is most surely deceived, if he thinks himself on the highway to heaven. He may even have been an Adventist, and apparently a thorough-going Adventist, for these fifteen years! If one such selfish individual could gain admittance there, they would well-nigh destroy all the bliss of that world of glory.

Many are of a different natural temperament. Their way is naturally mild, and gentle, and pliable, and they are disposed to take things easy. Such a one is so bland and lamb-like, and so resigned to the will of heaven, and withal, talks and prays so devoutly, that he supposes himself a christian, by all means. But let his own will be laid along-side the revealed will of God; and which will be chosen? Let, for instance, his self interest be at stake, and what course will he pursue? The Lord commands us to be as anxious that others should be comfortable as that ourselves should be. His language is this: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even the same to them," &c. Self-interest says, "supply your own wants first; and then if you have anything to spare, give to the needy." Now which will you do? Let the conduct of multitudes who profess to be serving God, give the answer.

Again, the Lord requires self-denial. Nature pleads for indulgence. The Lord says, "Having, therefore, food and raiment, let us be therewith content." He who has not learned subjection to the will of God, wants this, and wants that, and cannot be contented then.

"Deny thyself and take thy cross,
Is the Redeemer's great command;
Nature must count her gold but dross,
If she would gain that heavenly land."

HORACE P. SIKES.

Northfield, Mass.

A BIGOT.—The celebrated John Foster thus describes a bigot: "He sees religion, not as a sphere, but a line, and it is a line in which he is moving. He is like an African buffalo—sees right forward, but nothing on the right or left. He would not perceive a legion of angels or devils at the distance of ten yards, on the one side or the other."

☞ Lay up a good store of patience, but be sure and put it where you can find it.

For the Crisis.

The World's Trinity.

"The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," compose the great god, or gods, which this world mainly worship. In the parable of the marriage of the king's son, the king sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding; and they would not come! Again, he sent forth other servants, saying; tell them that were bidden, Behold, I have prepared my dinner, and all things are ready; come unto the marriage! But they made light of it, and went their ways, to engage in their various occupations; and the remnant took his servants, and slew them. But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth; and he sent forth his armies and destroyed those murderers, and burnt up their city.

So it is; the mass of mankind spurn the messages of mercy sent in love and pure benevolence to them from the best of all benefactors. They choose to worship and serve the creatures and things of earth, and neglect the service of their Creator, and thus peril their soul's present and eternal welfare! If a man could gain all the honors, and all the riches, and all the pleasures of this vain world, and lose his soul, what would it profit him? would he in reality gain by it? Let the impenitent sinner answer this question honestly before God. The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, comprise the whole that the world can call good, or great; yet it is but dross in comparison to the excellency of the knowledge of Christ. It is just as the poet says;

"The world is far too poor
To make me truly blessed."

The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary one to the other. But the holy Apostle says, walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfill the lust of the flesh. Now the works of the flesh are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, sedition, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like; of the which I tell you now, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; and he adds, "They that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." Here is the looking glass into which all, yea, every one may look and judge of their true character. If we live in the Spirit, we shall also walk in the Spirit; and if we walk in the Spirit, we shall not be desirous of vain glory. If old things are passed away, and all things have become new, we shall not desire to worship any of the gods the world worship. The world, the flesh, and Satan will be rejected; and we shall be found worshiping the only living and true God. "By their fruit ye shall know them." Amen. P. TANDY.

Invocation.

SABBATH AT HOME.

My Father, wilt thou bless those that have this day assembled for thy worship. May thy Holy Spirit's influence rest upon them, and may they be strengthened and encouraged to persevere in that course which will lead them to life eternal.

Especially, we entreat thee to look in tender compassion on the lambs of the flock, and protect them from the evils of these last days; throw around them thine arms of love, and carry them in thy bosom.

Jesus, thou Savior of sinners, wilt thou be near to comfort those that this day obey thy commands and follow thee into the liquid grave. May the hope of the resurrection cheer their hearts, amid the trials of this present world, and may they be enabled to run the race with patience, looking unto Jesus. And may some poor sinner be convicted of sin, and led to exclaim,—"God be merciful to me a sinner;" some poor wanderer resolve,—"I will arise and go to my Father."

For the Crisis.

What is the Difference?

If I rightly understand the general evangelical belief, it is that good men at death go directly to heaven and reward, and that there they know and see all that is going on, or being done in this world. The modern Spiritualists believe that when the good die, they pass directly into the spirit land perfectly conscious, knowing much more than they have ever known before; that they are among their friends, comforting and directing them at all times. Hence, communications directly from them can be had. In both cases, the evangelical heaven and the spirit land seem to be synonymous; both claim a state of perfect felicity.

Now let us look at both these states of conscious happiness, and see how they compare with Bible felicity, or a Bible heaven. A good woman dies, leaving a husband with six children. She passes directly to either of the above places, and is conscious, seeing all the transactions of the family. Suppose her eye fastens upon the companion of her youth, while lonely and mourning her loss, instead of deriving consolation from the right source. He turns to his cups, and leads a profligate life, the children following not a pace behind their miserable father. How will the mother's heart feel now? But suppose two of the children should turn from vice to virtue, and she is now made doubly happy in her state of felicity. It will in a moment be turned to grief by a look at the profligate ones; for if the mother can feel well, she can feel ill. What think you of a heaven or paradise like this? Who cannot see that this would be no better than the present world? and as for permanent happiness it could not be had.

This does not compare with the heaven our Lord has in reserve for the righteous at his coming and kingdom. His plan of redemption finds man under the death penalty by appointment;—"It is appointed unto man once to die;" then the judgment. The saints all sleeping quietly in Jesus, their first fruit. The dead all silent in the grave; no device nor knowledge there. Man's sons come to honor and he knoweth it not. His children become reckless profligates; but not a discordant note reaches his ear; all is still. His hours of sleepless solicitude are all past; the grave is his resting place till his change come! He says with Job, "I will wait all the days of my appointed time till my change come." Unconscious of all the varying scenes that are passing round him till the sounding of the judgment clarion—the last trump—"for the trumpet shall sound," then all the sleepers shall awake, and all that are in the GRAVES shall come forth! The living are changed! a sweet sound is heard —come, come, my people, wing your way to your chambers; all the good are on the way together to meet their Lord in the air, and so are ever with him.

The earth now undergoes a process of purification by fire, and is cleansed of all its wickedness. The wicked receive their doom, the second death. The dragon, the beast, and false prophet, all go into the lake of fire, which is the second death. The judgment has passed. The earth now appears in her Eden beauty and glory. "No more curse." Thank Heaven! the truthful promise is fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet—"Behold I create new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." The righteous have awaked from their momentary slumbers, and are all there. Eternal life has been breathed into them, neither can they die any more. Glory to God! Heaven is theirs eternally. No looking over the battlements of heaven to see the wicked writhe in anguish with eternal burnings! No, no, they have been utterly consumed, cut off; into smoke have they consumed away. They have become as though they had never been.

The righteous can now look East, and then look West,
The land is all good, the fruit is the best;
Their trials all over, their work was well done,
Their welcome is blessed,—they're all now at home.

In hope of life eternal,

L. BOUTELL.

☞ Light has come into the world, but it has not come with such convincing and irresistible evidence as to compel men to believe; but it has left them in freedom to come unto it or not to come; to believe in it, or not to believe, according as their works may be, and as their hearts may determine the question.

Letter from Bro. B. Spaulding.

BRO. GRANT:—I have just left the Islands, where I have been laboring steadily five months with encouraging success, for the Lord has given me access to minds there, and I have visited most every family on ten islands, embracing five townships. I have visited about seven hundred families, traveled about seven hundred miles on foot, and given one hundred lectures, and given away eight dollars' worth of tracts and children's little story books, or Bible stories; the whole expense amounting to thirty dollars over and above all I have received. I say this much to let brethren know that I am not making money out of my labors; my time is the Lord's; I make no account of that.

God has blessed me in my labors. I have enjoyed myself much in doing my duty; my health has been first rate. I have not been idle one day. I have scattered the tracts which were sent me from Boston; it has given me a great degree of pleasure to circulate them. I have had to be wise as a serpent in distributing them, and have endeavored to give them where they would be read, and then circulated, and they are scattered over six townships; and I feel confident that good will be done by these little missionaries.

Again, I say, the Lord bless the donor; while they have watered others, may their own souls be watered. I feel grateful to the good Lord that he has preserved my health and strength, that he has opened ears to hear, and hearts to feel, and that I have experienced the greatest degree of hospitality from the people. These Islands have never before had the coming of Jesus, the literal resurrection of the body, the judgment in the future, the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked preached unto them. They were all very familiar with the idea of dying and going to heaven before the judgment day, before their cases were decided, and of receiving their reward or punishment before the resurrection.

But the public mind has been aroused even here after so long a time, and there is a general inquiry, "are these things so?" and a desire to know what the Scriptures do teach. And I have given lectures in every neighborhood in five townships. My lectures have all been on these important subjects; and I purpose to go again in April, the Lord willing, and try to increase further light on these glorious subjects. I feel it is necessary for me to withdraw from so close attention to one subject for a little while, to rest the nervous system, and shall visit among the brethren in Maine and New Hampshire for two or three months. And if any of our preaching brethren want a field of labor, where there is encouragement for doing good, let them come down to Mount Desert, and the little islands around it. I cannot promise them much money, but I can promise them kind, hospitable treatment, and good, attentive, candid congregations, and a great prospect of doing good.

The people here are not sectarian, because they have no ministers to make them so, and no churches, or next to none; their organizations being all run down, until they have nearly or quite lost their identity. Of course nobody is afraid that our Church will be hurt, or our minister's salary injured; this removes the principal obstacles in the way of the spread of the Advent doctrine.

Yours still looking and waiting for the King, B. SPAULDING.

For the Crisis.

Reply to "Lara."

BRO. GRANT:—A friend of mine has handed me the Crisis, in which is the following question:—"Will some one, through the Crisis, harmonize the following passages on temptation? James 1: 13; Gen. 22: 1."

This is not the only place in God's record where there is an apparent contradiction, over which the infidel has stumbled. There are places where, for the want of noticing an implied condition, they have conceived a bold and false assertion. For instance. When God sent Jonah to Nineveh, his message was, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown;" with no expressed condition whatever; yet, believing, repenting Nineveh, had a reprieve of forty years.

We state another similar case. When David was shut up in Keilah, a town that had gates and bars, he, hearing that Saul would certainly come down and destroy the city for his sake, besought the Lord to tell his servant, whether Saul would come down, and whether the men of Keilah would deliver him up, and received for an answer an unconditional, "he will," and "they will." And yet Saul never went down, and consequently David was never delivered up. Here, too, we perceive the implied condition. The faithful sentinel is there, although he may not be seen or heard. Sometimes he speaks out and says,—"If thou wilt enter into life," &c. "If ye continue in my words," &c. "If ye do these things ye shall never fall," &c.

But there are places where our present version of God's word might be greatly improved; and I apprehend that the text in Gen. 22: 1, is one of this character. The Scriptures represent that the christian's faith has to be tried, "tried as by fire;" and Abraham, being the father of the faithful, had the privilege, yea, honor, of leading the way, for God tried him in the transaction referred to, in the most painful manner. And that is all that is meant in the passage under consideration, and ought, in my judgment, to have been so translated. Dr. Clarke says, "The word tempt, from tento, signifies no more than to prove, or try, yet as it is now generally used to imply a solicitation to evil, it would be well to avoid it here." Hence, if we read the passage under consideration,—"God did TRY Abraham," &c. &c.,—we avoid all seeming contradiction, harmonizing the passage with the one in St. James' epistle, and state simply, and only, what were the facts in the case. For but few, if any, of Abraham's heirs, or heirs of the same promise, have been tested, or tried, more severely than Abraham was; yet in the whole transaction there is not the least intimation that there was any temptation in the common acceptation of the term, as far as God was concerned; hence the truth of St. James' remark—"For God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man."

But the trial shows the special honor conferred on Abraham, and his decision and faithfulness under it. And we may learn from it, that God will especially honor us, if, like Abraham, we prove as firm and as true in our faith and obedience, when called to offer up our "Isaacs," or consecrate our gain unto the Lord, our substance unto the Lord of the whole earth, and our life, our all, to the service of the Most High. LIFE.

The past is like the closing day,
And memory like its gleam,
Which throws its faint and changing ray
Upon life's shadowy stream.

The future casts its dawning light
Back where the past draws nigh,
And hope and fear, like day and night,
Light up and shade its sky.

The present's like the lightning's flash,
Which comes and disappears;
It lights the future and the past,
Those dim, mysterious years.

Oh! what is life? the past is like
A picture on the heart;
The future, with its fairy form,
Doth hope and fear impart.

The present is a fearful thing,
A moment, and its flown,
And bears on its receding wing
The harvest we have sown.

Oh! what is life? 'tis like the wave
That's cast upon the sand,
We're tost and driven to the grave,
That dark and silent land.

This is life's end. Is there no more,
No more to hope or gain?
If this is all, would life were o'er,
The grave can feel no pain.

Turn unto me, the Savior saith,
Turn unto me and live,
I will redeem you back from death,
Eternal life I give.

His word is true, his promise sure,
There's every thing to gain;
For those who patiently endure,
Life will not be in vain.

Covetousness and Sacrifice.

A DISCOURSE.—BY ELD. J. HOWELL.

"There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches." PROV. 13: 7.

(Concluded.)

III. We will invite attention to the virtue taught in the proverb which we have selected, and expressed in these words:

"There is that maketh himself poor, yet hath GREAT RICHES."

The principle involved in this sentence is evidently one of sacrifice, and expresses the true relation which the christian, the devout follower of Jesus, sustains to the future blessings of the Gospel. He lives, if truly loyal to his Savior, a life of constant sacrifice, not only of time and abilities, but of his substance, willingly and cheerfully, to the cause of Jesus and the truth. By the constant observance of this principle, he may even become poor in the things of this world, and in respect to the future inherit "great riches," for "God hath chosen the POOR of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the (margin, that.) kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him."—Jam. 2: 5. This scripture, then, informs us what kind of poor the Lord hath chosen, namely, "them that love him." Poverty may be a virtue if occasioned, at least, in one of three ways.

1. If one's entire possessions are sacrificed for the cause of God and the truth of his word on the altar of christian integrity by confiscation, as in the case of the martyrs. How many of them, rather than deny God, and betray their confidence in his precious word, went forth from comfortable homes, and the enjoyment and possession of wealth, to suffer want and experience the most distressing poverty. Those persons loved God "in deed and in truth," and not merely "in word neither in tongue," as, alas! too many by far appear to love him now. . . . Their's was a lively affection, growing constantly stronger by an increasing appreciation of the God they worshiped, and of the promises he had made to the church.

2. When one sacrifices, through pure devotion to the cause of God, every enterprise, the almost infinite variety of means to secure wealth with which he is surrounded, his poverty is truly a virtue. How entirely different is such a course from that pursued by the worldling! Perhaps should the christian seek wealth, his love is so strong for it, that he would sacrifice his religion at the shrine of mammon. He therefore trusts in God, "and having food and raiment," is "therewith content." 1 Tim. 6: 8. He may be a preacher of the blessed Gospel. On him rests the woe. He loves the truth, but the truth is very unpopular. Duty urges him to publish it,—wealth bids him bow at its shrine. With tearful eye he bids it adieu, and falls in meekness and submission before his Savior; pledges himself to his service, turns his back on the world, and, with a heart overflowing with gratitude, goes forth to herald the coming of the Just One. The blessings, the honors, the conveniences of wealth, are all cheerfully sacrificed upon the altar of christian benevolence. He loves his God, he loves his Savior, he loves the church, he loves his dying fellow men, and appreciating the divine favor so richly experienced by himself, and contemplating the "glory, honor, and immortality" in an undecaying inheritance, of which he is the heir, he bids the treasures of earth a final "good bye," and with delight enters upon his work, a "fisher of men." Is not the sacrifice of earthly treasures for the glory of God, the salvation of men, the advancement of truth, and to secure the kingdom, a virtue, although, if need be, it reduces one to poverty? Heb. 11: 36–38. And would not covetousness, involving as it does the absence of all these blessed objects, be a vice of no ordinary character?

3. Finally, poverty is a virtue when occasioned by the voluntary distribution of a possession as the providence of God requires, and as the cause of truth exhibits its actual needs. That such a requirement is possible is apparent from the record in Matt. 19: 21, where Jesus required a young man, who "had great possessions," to dispose of it, distribute it, and secure "treasure in heaven." And it is certainly the duty of such to give of their substance to the Lord, instead of robbing him, "in tithes and offerings."—Mal. 3: 8–12. O, "beware of covetousness."

Our text says, "there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches." It is voluntary. He "maketh himself poor." How different the choice. The first chooses this world and loses the future. The latter chooses the future world, "the unsearchable riches of Christ," yea, "durable riches and righteousness," and cheerfully gives up this world to secure it. How evident is the truth of the text and the doctrine it expresses.

The relative value of the riches of this life contrasted with those of the future, is as "nothing" to "great riches." O, christian brother, in conclusion, let me earnestly invite you to draw this contrast. Contrast the blessings, the glory, the greatness, the benefits of this world; wealth, yea, and the world with it, with the blessing, the glory, the wisdom, the power, the riches and the honor of "the world to come," also including that world, and how meagre does every thing look here; and will you niggardly sacrifice the paltry gain of this world to a cause which bestows such infinite gain to its votaries? Will you be decoyed away from blessings infinite, and life eternal, by that which you brought not into the world, and it is certain you can carry nothing of it out?—1 Tim. 6: 7. Come! come! kill out the noxious weed of covetousness, by living fully up to the principles of christian benevolence, and read the advantage of it in Matt. 25: 34–40; being careful to observe the curse consequent upon the opposite course in Matt. 25: 41–46. Now will you be covetous? Dare you be covetous? Shall the minister suffer want through your neglect? The paper you love so well become involved in debt, and wade through deep embarrassment for want of your aid, while you borrow your neighbor's? Will you be on the poor list when you have means to pay? Shall the distribution of tracts be suspended, and the pure, precious truth borne by them to thousands of famishing, dying, perdition-bound souls, be kept from them? Who will bear the responsibility of all this, and hoard up this world's goods? Who will let the cause, the precious cause of Christ, suffer, shall I say a crucifixion, as did its Master, and bleed at every pore for want of means, and meet the consequences in the judgment day?

Do you ask why this earnest appeal? It is not by request. Not because I lack! No, thank God, I have "food and raiment." It is on account of the danger to which the covetous are exposed. Listen! "For this KNOW, that NO . . . COVETOUS man, who is an idolater, (Col. 3: 5,) hath ANY inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God."—Eph. 5: 5, 6, 7. "Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. Be not ye therefore partakers with them." Amen.

How awful the reflections of the covetous when excluded from the kingdom of God, if indeed they have time for reflection before their utter destruction. They have delighted to contemplate its approach, have admired the harmony of the gospel, loved the communion of the waiting ones, talked of the blessed seasons when once redeemed, anticipated communion with Abraham and the worthies, longed for eternal life, and perhaps at times, when the conviction of the importance of christianity overpowered their love of the world, they prayed fervently for Jesus to come, and come he will; the time has arrived; but, O God, where is that covetous one? He is not in the kingdom; no, all these are benevolent; the poor have received freely of their substance; he knows nothing of the blessings of the redeemed, no, for redemption is not for his class; he is no associate with the worthies, for he was not worthy; he has not eternal life, for he has not the character necessary to secure it. Alas! alas! he is as "though he had never been." O! for that little glistening dust of temporary value, he has sacrificed his being. The promises of that God in whose image he was made, he has sacrificed for the world, and with the world he loves so well, God leaves him to perish.

May God save us all from covetousness, and grant us a home in his kingdom, through Jesus our Savior. Amen.

Hate.

"Living in malice and envy."

How easily the unregenerate heart is thrown from its orbit! how ungovernable its passions! Like the blazing comet, or a flashing meteor, it blazes out and flashes uncontrollable fiery temper, and oft in explosive, terrific language, frightening the weak and timid; but dishonoring and injuring most itself,—when like those erratic, celestial bodies, it retires away,—but in shame and contempt; and "to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever."

"Envy," too, watches the prosperity and success of the good, virtuous, and enterprising, who have faith to believe that they can accomplish something by perseverance, and that there are victories to be achieved in the battles of life. Like the coiled serpent concealed in the grass, watching the opportunity to spring upon the unconscious traveler,—so "envy" seeks the convenient time to suddenly dart forth its tongue of slander, and lay bare its poisoned fangs of malice to bite and destroy its intended victim.

"Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who is able to stand before envy?"—Prov. 27: 4. "Hate" and "envy" are self-destroying also: "For wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one." Job 5: 2. "Envy is the rottenness of the bones."—Prov. 14: 30. "But if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, glory not and lie not against the truth. This kingdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace." James 3: 14–18.

For the Crisis.

Which: Dead, or Alive?

BY D. T. TAYLOR.

"To be or not to be," as saith Shakespeare, is "the question." Souls in hades,—are they dead, or alive? Who can tell us? Perhaps I am a caviler. Perhaps I don't understand the laws of language. Perhaps I am thick-skulled. Perhaps I can't see through a millstone, even when there is a hole in it. Perhaps all these and more—perhaps not. At any rate I am in pursuit of knowledge under difficulties: in a condition of betweenity very perplexing. I don't know whether dead people have dreams or no; whether they are dead or alive. Now don't get vexed at my ignorance. Let us all keep cool and good natured.

Ten years ago I embraced the view of literal death for sinful men at their final resurrection and judgment, upon reading Storr's Six Sermons and have seen no reason since that time to abandon the heresy. But as to the state of the so-called dead, I, for an equal length of time, have been on the fence. Have read Storrs, Dobney, Milton, Litch, Hastings, Ham, Blain, Bliss, Marsh, Grant, Walsh, Hudson and the rest in vain. They could n't get me off the fence. I cannot solve the mystery of souls in hades, and so my perplexity remains. Don't know whether I am a "materialist" or not. Wish I did, as it seems to be something awful. I have a thousand questions to ask, and if some learned one would answer them to my satisfaction, I should get light. But nobody ever did answer them—and there is no lack of words in this war—and my fate is doubtful. I confess to some totter-[illegible] be, but hope that should I ever get over this ten years of fence-riding, and once more stand on terra firma, I shall be found on the side with God and his truth. I do want to honor Him in my opinions of his word. Amen. Well, here are some of my heretical queries.

☞ 1. Why, if the soul does possess conscious existence both in the first and second death, that somewhere in all the 857 usages of nephesh and psukee in the Bible there is not attached some qualifying term, such as ever-living, deathless, never-dying, immortal, etc., to indicate said existence? Would n't the place where soul is found, be just the place to prefix such qualifying terms? To produce these would be coming up to the "scratch." It would at once establish a bulwark for the view, and its advocates would not have to resort to abstract phrases where soul is n't mentioned, such as "everlasting fire," &c., to prove the doctrine. Should they set out to discover the desired terms and texts, they would probably find themselves in a predicament similar to that of the good Methodist sister, who, upon asking a Baptist deacon where her minister found authority for sprinkling, was told to open her Bible and read till she came to where it mentioned about baptizing babies, and the proof for sprinkling would be found in the next verse.

2. Why, if the Bible does teach the fact, Prof. Bush, the erudite, critical Prof. Bush, in his work on "The Soul," written to prove "that man exists in the absolute integrity of his nature apart from the material body which he here inhabits," p. 65, after exploring and analysing the Hebrew and Greek soul in all its supposed varied meanings and applications, produces but two texts from the Bible to prove that "the term psukee (soul) is applied to man after his dislodgment from the house of clay," p. 65,—in plain words but two passages which seem to speak of a soul alive and out of the body, and these from that book (not written to prove ethics and doctrines) full of symbolic visions—the Apocalypse. Ah, the mountain and the mouse! What aileth thee, O Professor, that thou didst not bring forth the burden of proof?

3. Why, if real live souls outside of the body (and are there not millions of them?) has been so common a thing ever since Adam died, the casket decayed to be sure, but, in the words of good brother Litch, "the inner man undecomposed, with all his members entire, perfect,"—Discussion, p. 31,—and consequently visible somehow, by somebody, that in not another place in the Bible is it recorded that any prophet, apostle, or any one else, ever "saw" said entity in the above described condition, whether in hades or out, save John in his symbolic visions? Remember we are discussing souls, not spirits. Was the sight of a disembodied living soul indeed so rare that it was reserved only for the Seer of Patmos to behold it? And if "souls" in Rev. 6: 9, and 20: 4, may properly be rendered "persons"—as it may be—who ever saw a disembodied human soul? Who?

4. Why the advocates of live souls out of the body, and in sheol or hades, when they wish to prove the doctrine, are obliged to resort to a class of texts where one or the other leg of the theory is wanting? For example, the texts that mention hades, and seem to show something alive in it, don't mention that something as being the un-bodied soul, and those texts that do seem to mention live soul, don't say it is in hades. Luke 16th mentions hades, but does not say it was the rich man's soul that was in it. Rev. 6th mentions apparently live souls, but does not say plainly they were in hades. So with others. And neither psukee or hades is spoken of in Luke 23: 43. Why have to infer so much? Why not find a text that says right out, live conscious, disembodied souls are in sheol or hades, and so fairly prove the whole view by the text?

5. Why, on the supposition that human souls out of the body are strictly and literally alive and conscious in sheol or hades, the Bible should always describe them [illegible] sheol—stirreth up the dead for thee." Luke 16: 31,—"Though one rose from the dead," i. e., (verse 23,) from hades. Rev. 20: 13,—"Death and hades delivered up the dead which were in them," &c. We are aware that good and evil beings in the flesh are said to be dead while yet alive. Col. 3: 3, and 1 Tim. 5: 6, (simply, we think, because their future death was inevitable,) but is man or soul ever said to be truly alive after what we call death? The Bible says the inhabitants of sheol or hades are dead. Now if the disembodied soul, the supposed real man, can in proper language be called dead while actually alive and conscious in hades, what language shall be employed to express its condition if actually and strictly dead? If when alive it is called dead, then if dead it should be called—what? DEAD-ER, or alive? My perplexity increases.

6. Why, if the spiritual soul (the main thing) is alive and conscious in death, there are so many passages that truly rendered call the material carcass (the mean thing) of deceased men a "dead soul," as in Numb. 19: 11,—"He that toucheth the—meth nephesh—dead soul of any man that is dead," &c., and some sixty other similar texts; and so few—are there any passages that ever speak of the supposed immortal man proper as a living soul after the man has died? Is it really of more consequence to know that the visible and decaying carcass is a dead soul, than it is to be assured of the supposed fact that the so-called immortal principle is the real live soul, and sheltered in sheol? Is the casket of more worth and dignity than the jewel? We know this is "the land of the living," (Ezk. 32: 23,) but is sheol ditto?

7. Why, if human soul or mind does "exist apart from the material body," as saith the Professor, and in that "undiscovered bourne" called sheol or hades, still possesses the functions and attributes of life, such as consciousness, knowledge, thought, feeling, etc., and in that mysterious abode, is far from being an ignoramus, a know-nothing; that the Scriptures, (waving the testimony of Spiritualism, which is as clear as mud,) supposed to reveal all necessary things concerning the other worlds, should ask (Ps. 6: 5),—"In sheol who shall give thee thanks?" and say (Ps. 31: 17,)—"Let the wicked be silent in sheol," should affirm (Eccl. 9: 10,) that there is "no work in sheol," no device in sheol, no knowledge in sheol, no wisdom in sheol; should persistently declare (Isa. 38: 18,) that "sheol cannot praise thee;" should affirm of evil men (Ps. 49: 14) that their condition in sheol is "like (dead) sheep;" should never in all the seventy-six places where sheol and hades are found, tell us what any man is doing in the unseen realm, save in that much wrangled about parable concerning the defunct Mr. Dives, must we inquire, with Moses Stuart, if the Hebrews were really more "ignorant" of the state of the dead than the Egyptians? Can there be a dead immortal soul?

8. Why it is that if the so-called "never dying soul" don't really and truly die, but at this moment millions of them are conscious and alive in sheol or hades, the Bible never in plain terms gives them an active and real life there,—describing their sayings and doings,—setting forth the manner of their life,—recording their autobiography from the beginning of that strange life to its stranger close, in all the 76 texts where sheol and hades are found,—never alludes to anything the soul says or does in its unseen abode, save in two places, the one most clearly and confessedly figurative or dramatic, Isa. 14, and the other in a disputed parable, Luke 16. Are great facts thus hardly stated? Is God wont to let important truths rest on such scanty evidence? And if the consciousness of the soul in hades is an important and fixed fact, would not these 76 places where sheol and hades are mentioned, be the proper place to clearly and abundantly reveal that fact?

9. Why, when the wisest man that ever lived says Eccl. 9: 5, "the dead know not anything," he didn't say which dead. We have seen that the soul in sheol is affirmed to be dead, and we know the body in kever, the grave, is also dead. Now did this wise king mean to say the dead folks in sheol did n't know anything, or that the dead folks in kever did n't know anything? Or did he mean both? I ache to know which. If he meant the jewel-man, why then that kills out conscious existence in sheol. Suppose he meant the casket-man in kever, very well. As Solomon informs us the same being who did n't know anything when dead, did know something when "living," consequently that casket-man, the body, did really know a thing or two when alive—eh? How much do living bodies know? On which horn of the dilemma shall we hang? O king Solomon, why did you not tell us, and not leave us to the mercy of sapient critics?

10. Why, when the Scriptures tell us that Jesus, Lazarus, and several others undoubtedly went down to hades, they don't also tell us—what a rare chance!—what these righteous beings on their return to this world said they saw, did, felt and heard there? One of them, good Lazarus, was there four days, and had a chance not only to explore and examine the dark corners of grim old sheol, but also to cull some of the green flowers from the elysian fields of a place called Paradise, very curiously supposed by some people of strong imagination to be situated in some nook or corner, or upper story of said sheol. Why, he must have seen and heard enough to have written a book. Did he do it? Here are competent witnesses who ought to know, and whose solemn testimony once obtained could not be impeached. They could speak from experience, having been to and come from the "undiscovered (?) bourne." No need to be at the open tomb to question the risen dead concerning nephesh in hades. Muteness is often eloquent as words. And when we put these holy ones on the stand and ask for "truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," lo, they are silent! That silence, dear reader, of men from the other side of the grave, just when and where we should have the best evidence concerning the nature of death's chill and mystic river, has in it a remarkable significance!

11. Why,—but I'll stop. You [illegible] the way I am drifting. Am through this time, dear Crisis, but hades is as dark as ever. There are many more whys and whyfores in my brain. They are endless. Am I thenceforth immortal? Ah! doubts will arise. I shall yet pursue my disquisitions in this direction,—even though I merit the awful charge of materialism—if the good Lord lets me live. But why that proviso? (I do wish my causality would be still.) If the gospel according to Spiritualism be true, can't I just as easily send you a letter from hades? And should I be any more culpable than righteous Samuel, who, it is curiously claimed, was his own mail-carrier between Endor and Sheol, all the while out of the body? If Spiritualism be indeed a valid proof of the soul's life in death, suppose we get the spirits to tell us all about hades? How many christians reply, YES?

For the Crisis.

The Rich Man and Lazarus.

Dear Bro. Grant:—I have met the following exposition of this subject, by James Bate, M. A., Rector of Deptford. If you think it worthy of the consideration of your readers, please give it a place in your edifying periodical.

Yours truly, H. Grew.

"We will suppose, then, the rich man, who fared so sumptuously, to be the Jew, so amply enriched with the heavenly treasure of divine revelation. The poor beggar who lay at his gate, in so miserable a plight, was the poor Gentile, now reduced to the last degree of want, in regard to religious knowledge. The crumbs which fell from the rich man's table, and which the beggar was so desirous of picking up, were such fragments of patriarchal and Jewish traditions, as their traveling philosophers were able to pick up with their utmost care and diligence. And those philosophers were also the dogs that licked the sores of heathenism, and endeavored to supply the wants of divine revelation, by such schemes and hypotheses concerning the nature of the gods, and the obligation of moral duties, as (due allowance for their ignorance and frailties) did no small honor to human nature, and yet thereby plainly showed, how little a way unassisted reason could go, without [illegible] of the wisest of them frankly confessed. About one and the same time, the beggar dies, and is carried by the angels (i. e. God's spiritual messengers to mankind) into Abraham's bosom, that is, he is engrafted into the church of God. And the rich man also dies and is buried. He dies what we call a political death. His dispensation ceases. He is rejected from being any longer the peculiar son of God. The people whom he parabolically represents, are miserably destroyed by the Romans, and the wretched remains of them, driven into exile over the face of the earth, were vagabonds, with a kind of mark set upon them, like Cain, their prototype, for a like crime; and which mark may perhaps be their adherence to the law. Whereby it became amazingly to pass, that these people, though dispersed, yet still dwell alone and separate, not being reckoned among the nations, as Balaam foretold. The rich man being reduced to this state of misery, complains bitterly of his hard fate, but is told by Abraham that he slipped his opportunity, while Lazarus laid hold on his, and now receives the comfort of it. The Jew complains of the want of more evidence to convince his countrymen, the five brethren, and would fain have Lazarus sent from the dead to convert them. But Abraham tells him, that if their own Scriptures cannot convince them of their error, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead. And exactly so it proved in the event. For this parable was delivered towards the end of the third year of our Lord's ministry; and in the fourth, or following year of it, the words put into the mouth of Abraham, as the conclusion of the parable, are most literally verified by our Lord's raising another Lazarus from the dead. And we may presume, that the beggar had the fictitious name of Lazarus given him in the parable, not without some reason, since the supposed request of the rich man was fully answered by our Lord's raising another, and a real Lazarus, from the dead. But what was the consequence? Did this notorious miracle convince the rich man's brethren? no, truly. His visit to them from the dead was so far from convincing them, that they actually consulted together, that they might put Lazarus also to death; because that, by reason of him, many of the Jews went away and believed on Jesus. So much for the true sense of this parable."

The Soul.—No. 16.

Having examined the meaning of psukee, the word rendered soul, in the New Testament, and found that in its primary use it means the whole being, like nephesh, its corresponding word in the Old Testament, and that when it is rendered life, it represents the "animated principle" common to all living creatures, the same as in the Hebrew; we pass to notice its third and last sense, when it is used to indicate a state of feeling.

"But the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds (psukee) evil affected against the brethren." Acts 14: 2. In this case, the feelings of the Jews were aroused against the Gentiles. "Consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds," (psukee.) Heb. 12: 3. We are here exhorted against a feeling of exhaustion and discouragement in the work of the Lord. When Paul is instructing servants, he says, "Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart," (psukee.) Eph. 6: 6. He would have the servant be interested, have his feelings enlisted, so as to engage in the work heartily. Paul seems to be opposed to all dronish feeling when we are engaged in a good cause, and would have servants be watchful against such. Again he says, when writing to the same class,—"And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, (psukee) as to the Lord, and not to men." Col. 3: 23.

We think these examples show plainly [illegible] to represent a state of mind or feeling.

We have not yet found any intimation of an immortal soul, but there are two texts that are frequently presented as evidence that the soul never dies. One is in Rev. 6: 9, and the other in Matt. 10: 28. "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held." The two following verses read, "And they cried with a loud voice, saying, how long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled."

There are four points that should be noticed in the account.

1. What was seen?
2. Where seen?
3. Their cry.
4. Their condition.

1. What was seen? We are told by some that "it was their disembodied immortal spirits;" but that word psukee, here translated soul, is not rendered spirit once in the Bible. Another says, "it was their disembodied immortal souls." We have not yet been able to find any proof that such exist as conscious entities, nor any evidence that such ever were seen, or can be seen, unless it is found in this passage. The souls say "our blood," but do not speak as though their bodies had been killed and they, the souls, had escaped unharmed. We have many examples where nephesh, the Hebrew word corresponding with psukee, is rendered person; and in Prof. Whiting's translation of the New Testament, psukee is rendered person in this passage. Prof. Whiting has the reputation of being one of the best Greek and Hebrew scholars in America, and is now employed in the new translation by the American Bible Union. If this be rendered person, it will be in harmony with the whole Bible; whereas, if we use the word soul, in the popular sense, we make the Scriptures contradict themselves.

2. Where were they seen?—"Under the altar." Where was the altar? Dr. Clarke, when speaking on this passage, says:—"The altar is upon earth, not in heaven." It could not have been either in heaven or hell (hades), for they were slain neither in the one nor the other. It seems that John saw in vision the great slaughter field, where the martyrs were to be slain upon earth, and calls it "the altar," on which millions were butchered for their testimony in favor of Jesus. Let it be remembered, these souls (persons) are seen about the altar, which was upon the earth.

3. Their cry. If they were alive, it appears they were in a very uneasy and suffering condition; in which case, it must have been their cry as they were led by the thousand to the altar for slaughter, but there is another sense in which they cry. As Dr. Clarke says, "Their blood, like that of Abel, cried for vengeance." Says the Lord to Cain, "The voice of thy brother's blood CRIETH unto me from the ground." It is said of Christ that his "blood.. speaketh better things than that of Abel." Thus does the blood of the martyrs cry. It should be observed that the account is clothed more or less in symbolical language, and should not be so interpreted as to contradict plain and literal scripture; which would be the case, if this passage was made to teach that the souls of men are conscious, when the men themselves are dead.

4. Their condition. They are not only "under the altar," which is upon earth, but they are "killed." It is that very part that John saw; that part which cried that was "killed." This same class is mentioned again in Rev. 20: 4. "And I saw the souls (persons, Whiting's trans.) of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the DEAD lived not again until the thousand years were finished." This is so plain it seems to need no comment. Some of these souls, or persons, had been beheaded, which of course killed them. Then they could not reign with Christ till made alive; hence we read they lived, and "this is the first resurrection." "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." Why say they "lived not," if they were all alive in hades, in torment?

We think it plain that John saw in vision the martyred saints during the Papal persecutions, as they lay weltering in their blood, which like Abel's and [illegible] was a witness against their cruel tormentors. They remain in the embrace of death till the vision passes on to Rev. 20: 4, where he sees them live again and commence their reign with Christ, and are pronounced "blessed" because they have "part in the first resurrection."

The New Music Book.

Those interested in seeing the best collection of music for christian worship, are requested to send us any good tunes which they wish inserted, and they will be placed in the hands of the committee. They can send the names of the tunes, stating where they may be found, and we will endeavor to obtain them. The book is being prepared, but it requires considerable time to make it what is desired. If any have choice hymns they wish inserted, if they will forward them to the Crisis office, they will receive all due attention. Send soon.

☞ We are requested to state that the new Time argument, prepared by Dr. Decker and others, has been unavoidably delayed in its issue until the present time. Orders addressed to Dr. A. Decker, or A. Flavell, Newark, N. J., will receive prompt attention, without money and without price.

Morals of Paris.

This great and wicked city is becoming more and more like Sodom. Her cup seems to be about full. Says the Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveller:—

"It has been a week of crimes. There have been eight murders committed in Paris alone. Crime is increasing so rapidly throughout France that the government has forbidden the newspapers publishing the docket of the criminal courts, on the ground that the publication needlessly alarms public opinion as to the true state of the country."

The cities of our own free (?) country are not far in the rear. How can an honest Bible student believe the world is growing better, when Scripture and facts both prove the opposite? Let all who are indulging the false hope that the moral condition of the world will be any better than now, before the Lord comes, read 2 Tim. 3: 1–5.

☞ "Talk to me now in Scripture language alone," said a dying christian. "I can trust the words of God; but when they are the words of man, it costs me an effort to think whether I may trust to them." This was the testimony of one who died in the morning of life.

Approaching Crisis.

"Distress of nations with perplexity" still continues, and the tide of uneasiness and restless tossings in the minds of the great men keeps rising higher, and, we think, may be soon lashed into the awful tempest. The political aspect of Europe is very threatening. Every movement betokens that mighty revolutions are at hand. The dashing to pieces of earth's wicked kingdoms cannot be far off. We are standing upon the crumbling brink of time, very near the point where the everlasting kingdom of Christ is to be set up,—when "the kingdoms of this world" will become the kingdom of our Savior. We can say with John, "Come, Lord Jesus," and "come quickly." "The end of all things is at hand." Like the man sailing down the Niagara till near the great cataract, the wicked of this world have floated carelessly down the stream of time, till they are now in the mighty rapids, about to plunge into perdition. O that they would heed the last calls of mercy now so kindly proffered; if not, they must soon be left, like the antediluvians and inhabitants of the cities of the plain, to receive the vials of wrath from the hand of the Lord. Why will men be so foolish? Why will they not come to the Lord and have life? The prize is offered without money, so that the poor may come in all their poverty and be made joint heirs with Christ the King of Kings. What honor! what glory! awaits the faithful, humble soul that trusts in Jesus and keeps his commandments. Why will not all love and obey him? "Come, sinner, come."

The following articles show the present gloomy aspect of the old world.

SIGNS OF TROUBLE IN EUROPE.

The political system of Europe seems like a spider's web spun from Paris as a centre. When Louis Napoleon moves—moves only his tongue—all the threads, from London to Constantinople, from Madrid to St. Petersburg, tremble violently, like a reed shaken in the wind. He says, at a crowded levee, to the Austrian ambassador that he is sorry the relations between the two countries are not so good as they were, but still he retains his personal good will for the Emperor of Austria. This simple expression falls like a "voice for war" on all the auditors, and conveys fear [illegible] Europe, as it flashes on the telegraphic wires. Down goes the Bourse, and remains palpitating, as it were, three days. The London Stock Exchange feels the blow, and all the money circles of the continent show an unusual pertubation. Everybody fall to speculating—not financially, by any means—looking over the map of Europe, and calculating where outbreak is most imminent. Italy, already in a ferment, gives further signs of trouble; and Austria dispatches 30,000 more soldiers in that direction, holding it needful that she have within the Italian boundaries at the present time 100 000 men.

All these things indicate a most insecure posture of affairs in Europe. But whether they are the presage of war, or merely evanescent displays, remains to be seen. Many times have similar warnings passed off without result, while great events, like those of 1848, have sprung up in an instant. But there can be no doubt that the general situation of things on the continent is favorable to changes of a serious nature. For some reason, not yet clearly apparent, Louis Napoleon is dissatisfied with the course of Austria in Italy. Whether, as alleged, she prevents his more liberal policy in that quarter, or stands in the way of his aggrandizement, or whether he must do something more for his cormorant army, does not appear. But whatever his secret motive, it is all one to the Italians, so long as they feel that he will not aid the Austrian tyranny over them. Russia, also, it is intimated, discountenances Austria, because the latter stood aloof in the Crimean war, and, not unnaturally, is said to love her late foes better than her lukewarm friend. England has declared that in any continental embroglio, she will be "counted out"—having learned that this fighting for others costs too much as a steady policy. Sardinia, with her exceedingly able manager, Count Cavour, is thought to be ready to assist Italy against Austria. As to Italy herself, her wrongs are sufficient to stir her to a struggle in which contingencies shall be thrown to the winds. But bound hand and foot, without opportunity for concert and preparatory training, what can she do?

But with all these separate provocatives to quarrel, there is still a sense of common danger of which all the nations of Europe cannot get rid. Once let the torch of war be lighted, and no one can foretell the extent of the conflagration. From Italy the contagion of rebellion might be communicated to Hungary, to Poland, and to parts of the Prussian dominions. The barricades might go up again in the streets of Paris; and throughout the rule of the Porte, Christian and Turk might renew their old warfare. Even England might have fears of the Emerald Isle. We think it likely, therefore, that the government will act in concert to smooth down the ruffled spirits of the present crisis, to explain away the causes of irritation, and to renew "distinguished considerations" generally. The effort may succeed this time, but it will not always.—Boston Journal.

Says a correspondent of the Boston Traveller, writing from Paris, Jan. 9th, 1859:—

"It is believed in a good many circles here that we are to have war in the spring. Officers of the army talk of nothing else. The public funds fell nearly a franc Monday, in consequence of a rumor that Napoleon had said to his cousin: 'I am determined the Austrians shall be driven out of Italy in the Spring.' Italy is in a great ferment produced by the agents of Russia and France to precipitate a war if possible. While Mazzini is counselling all his friends to keep quiet, as agitation now is but playing into the hands of Louis Napoleon."

"I confess to you, however, I do not see how he can avoid a war and keep his throne. The system of extravagance he is pursuing here is insane beyond conception. Money is wasted in the idlest caprices."

Infidelity.

It is now so common to hear men express a disbelief in the inspiration of the Bible, that he, who really in earnest attempts to sustain his sentiments by the Scriptures, is thought to be weak minded and priest ridden. He is laughed to scorn by those who, a short time since, were active in prayer meetings, and even preached the gospel to others. How faithfully is the prophecy of Paul, in 1 Tim. 4: 1, fulfilling at the present time. "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." This prophecy is becoming more and more apparent from day to day. It seems that times like those in the days of Noah and Lot have actually arrived, and hence we know that the Son of Man will soon appear to gather his weary children to their promised home.

The following is clipped from the Boston Herald:

W. L. Garrison, in his discourse at the Music Hall, on Sunday, denied the inspiration of the Bible in toto, and declared that he "should a thousand times prefer to risk his chance of getting to Heaven by following Tom Paine, than the doctrines of the South-Side View."

Let every christian gird on his armor more closely, and stand firmly in the defence of the truth of the Bible. Show the gentleness of the dove, and meekness of the lamb, but the boldness of the lion. If we could see the cause of truth stand firm, we must live holy lives. Our success in the cause of Christ in this world, and salvation in the world to come, depend on this. There is a multitude of professors, but only a few christians. May the Lord raise up Luthers and Wesleys all over the land, who will dare tell the people the truth and show them their sins, if they starve to death in the attempt. Live men are wanted, who will bow to no party interest or church creeds that contradict the word of the Lord.

Solemn Facts.

A New York correspondent of the Christian Intelligencer, in speaking of Dr. Sanger's "History of Prostitution," says:—

"As the 'houses of pleasure' in New York—for this is the modern name for what Solomon called the 'doors of hell'—are largely recruited from country towns and farm houses, it ought to be known by every wretched girl who meditates a life in the brothel, that the average duration of the abandoned woman's life in New York is just four years! It requires only that brief space of wild revelry, champaigning and carousing—of drink, degradation and disease—to reduce a beautiful girl of eighteen into a loathsome corpse, flung out to the corruption of a 'Potter's Field.'"

It is said by a New York writer, who has taken much pains to ascertain the extent of licentiousness in this Sodom of America, that,

"It requires 6,000 fresh victims to supply the yearly demands created by the 'greatest of all social evils,' for this city . . and most of these unfortunates are brought to their infernal market by intrigue, deception, and force."

We can only think of Sodom, when we read such things, and inquire, how long before the wickedness of the wicked will come to an end? O Lord, hasten the time when the virtuous will be removed from the temptations of the vile seducer. The writer goes on to say that,

"Within three miles of the city Hall are four hundred houses of ill fame, containing not less than four thousand abandoned females; and the police returns show that the whole number of professedly dissolute women in New York cannot be short of twenty thousand."

☞ There always exists within every effort which a man makes, the end he has in view, and the real, intrinsic value of the effect produced, is exactly correspondent and commensurate with the end proposed.

Query.

Will Bro. John Howell please explain through the Crisis, Acts 13: 48:—"And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed?"

H. J. Brown.

New Bedford.

There has been a good interest in this place for some time past, developing itself not only in the membership, but in the awakening and conversion of sinners. This church has realized the blessing of God, by evincing a willingness to labor for the cause of truth; and in putting their hand to the plough, God has prospered their efforts, and good has been the result.

About eight weeks ago, Bro. Munger commenced a series of meetings with this church, which continued for about seven weeks. Aided, as he was, during a great part of the time, by the untiring labors of Bro. Ross, the church at the same time acting in sympathy with their efforts, success was seen in every department. From the time the work commenced, the interest rose like the swelling of a mighty river after a rain, higher and still higher, going beyond its channels and over all its banks. It is said that nearly forty persons have been converted, and as many more reclaimed from a backslidden state; and that during the move, over two hundred have manifested a desire for religion, by coming on to the anxious seats. There is no doubt with regard to the genuineness of this work, and if these persons who have become interested, are sustained with good wholesome doctrine, and encouraged by the older members of the church, many of them will ultimately be instrumental in doing much good. Some of these converts may, on account of friends or outside influences, go to other meetings—this indeed is often the case—but there will be many who will join the church and be of much benefit in advancing its interests.

There is considerable interest manifested by the community. There seems to be an anxiety to hear the word preached, this fact being confirmed by the large number of persons who have attended the meetings while our brethren have labored for the good and welfare of this people. We see from this effort what might be effected in all our churches. Perhaps the same number would not, in every case, be converted, but good would attend the labors of the church. All, indeed, may not look for so great success as attends the labors of Bro. Munger, for he, from long and constant experience, has become an adept in angling with the "alder fishing pole;" but let each do the best he can, and Heaven will bless the effort.

Conference Report.

Our second Quarterly Conference of the West Central District in Maine, commenced in South Livermore, Thursday, Jan. 17th, 1859. The weather was very unfavorable, it being extremely cold and stormy the most of the time during the meeting. There were but few brethren from various societies, consequently there were no regular reports made. Our Secretary (Eld. I. C. Wellcome) not being present, it was thought advisable to adjourn to a time and place to be appointed by the brethren. The meetings in connection with the conference were as follows: Thursday, P. M., prayer meeting. In the evening remarks were made from 2 Pet. 3: 18. Friday, P. M., Eld. D. M. Hanscome preached from 2 Cor. 10: 4. In the evening, Bro. J. Dudley spoke from the 1st Psalm; also Saturday, A. M., from 2 Pet. 3: 3, 4. P. M., discourse by Bro. T. Thompson, of Carthage, a F. W. Baptist minister. Sabbath morning, preaching by Eld. D. M. Hanscome, from Num. 14: 8. It was an able and interesting discourse. P. M., preaching by Bro. J. Dudley, at the close of which the Lord's Supper was administered. There were above forty communicants. It was a season of much interest. Sabbath evening, discourse by the writer, from 1 Cor. 15: 58. One arose and requested prayers. He is now rejoicing in a Savior's love. We hope the efforts put forth at that meeting will not prove unavailing. My earnest prayer is that the word preached may profit, being mixed with faith in them that heard it, and we be brought to enjoy everlasting life in the kingdom of God.

Report of the N. W. Penn. Conference.

Met according to appointment on the evening of the 13th, notwithstanding the weather was quite unfavorable. A good congregation was present and listened to the word, as presented by Bro. J. Marsh, of Rochester, N. Y., from the 17th chap. of John.

Friday, 11 o'clock, met again for worship. Some few brethren and sisters came in from a distance. Bro. Marsh spoke to the people from Rom. 1: 1–6, after which sixteen brethren and sisters spoke to the edification and comfort of each other. Evening discourse by Bro. Marsh, from Acts 3d chap.

Saturday, A. M., half-past 10, met for business. Meeting opened by calling J. T. Ongley to the chair, Ira R. Hall Secretary. Prayer by J. Marsh. The object of the meeting was stated by J. T. Ongley. A report from him of a meeting held at Oak Hill, Chautauque Co., N. Y., in which twenty gave in their names, identifying themselves with the church of God. Remarks by Bro. E. Goodrich and J. Campbell of Washington, Erie Co., Pa., and others. A motion was made to appoint a committee to confer with the different churches in this region of country, to devise means to further the promotion of the truth, by subscription, or otherwise. Also, that Bro. J. T. Ongley serve as corresponding Secretary, of said committee. Other business was attended to, and then a discourse was given by Bro. E. Goodrich, from Mark 1: 22. Evening discourse by J. Marsh, from Acts 3: 21.

Sunday, half-past 10, A. M., stirring remarks by Bro. Goodrich on, "Be ye holy," &c. 11, A. M., discourse by J. Marsh, from Num. 14: 21. After the discourse, Bro. Leonard Blackmer was ordained Elder among us. (Bro. B. has been a local preacher among the Baptists for about two years.) Remarks by brethren, and then quite a number partook of the Lord's Supper, in commemoration of the sufferings of Christ, and the promise of his coming again.

Elders present, J. Marsh, Rochester, N. Y.; Daniel Osborne, Findley's Lake, Chautauque Co.; George Bush, Busti, Chaut., Co., N. Y.; E. Goodrich, Washington, Erie Co., Pa.; Leonard Blackmer, Randolph, Crawford Co., Pa.; John T. Ongley, Blooming Valley, Crawford Co., Pa.

Evening. Bro. Osborne spoke from Matt. 6: 1–7, and other Scriptures relating to Life and Death, about three fourths of an hour. Bro. Marsh then followed in a discourse on the 15th of Cor., to a crowded house. The congregation increased both in interest and numbers to the end. We trust that good will result from the meeting, the cause of our blessed Master be advanced, and his children furthered on in the divine life, and prepared for an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Heavenly Father.

Voted, that a report of this conference be sent to the Crisis and Expositor.

Conference adjourned to meet in April, time and place to be given hereafter.

JOHN T. ONGLEY, Chairman. IRA R HALL, Secretary.

P. S.—Should any of the brethren in other places wish to unite with us in the good work of our blessed Master, please correspond with Bro. J. T. Ongley, Blooming Valley, Crawford Co., Pa.

Help the Needy.

BRO. GRANT:—I write to inform the Brn. through the Crisis, of the situation of Bro. S. S. Brazee. He is now preaching the gospel, and feels that the Lord has called him into his service. He has formerly tried to preach and labor with his hands to support his family, which consists of his wife and five children; and by so doing he has got into debt, and is perplexed on every hand. He owes about $150, and if there are any brethren that have the means, and wish to lend to the Lord, here is a chance to do good. Bro. B. is tied and fettered on account of his debts, for, since he has given his whole time to the Lord, his debtors have come upon him like a rushing wind, and some have put their accounts into the hands of the lawyer to collect, and others have threatened the same, and he has not a dollar in the world towards paying his debts; for all he gets for preaching has to go for the support of his family, and they have to live very economically in order to get along. If there are any who wish to send Bro. Brazee anything, to relieve him from his trouble, direct to S. S. Brazee, Chester Factories, Mass.

P. S.—This is written by a sister who is acquainted with Bro. Brazee's situation, and sincerely believes that he is a minister sent by God. His labors are wonderfully blest, and many are led to believe in the true gospel by his labors.

This tract replies to some of the points advanced by Prof. Hovey in his late work, "The State of the Impenitent Dead." We copy an extract.

"Now we assert, against all theories of immortal woe, that WICKEDNESS HAS NO RIGHTS. It has none because it is essentially and eternally wrong. It is just the thing in all the universe which ought not to be. It has, therefore, at the outset, no right to exist. And of course, where it starts into existence, it has no shadow of right but to come to an end; if not by reformation, then by execution and extirpation. It can come into being only by fraudulent or violent intrusion. It is an outlaw that knows no rule, and has no proper place in all the world. It has no right of possession anywhere. Its only possible pretence of right is at best a 'squatter's claim.' It can assert no such right by any title that is known or customary in the world. It has never created, nor inherited, nor received by grant or purchase, nor obtained by first discovery, nor gained by occupancy undisturbed, nor has it earned by honest labor, nor won in manly trial of strength or skill, a single cubic inch of space for a home in all the universe of God. Nor is there any supreme Law of Nations that should give it a right of conquest in any realm of the King of kings. It begins only as rebellion, and has only a rebel's right either of citizenship or of residence. It lives only as revolt from God; and 'what world shall receive any of those who run away from him?'"*

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Blandford, Mass., Nov. 26th, 1858, MARYETTE BATES, eldest daughter of David and Elizabeth L. Bates, in the 19th year of her age.

I am under the painful necessity to announce to the readers of the Crisis the death of my dear daughter, which sad event has caused our hearts to bleed. In the prime of life and vigor of youth, who bid as fair to live as any of us, she, by that fell destroyer, Consumption, has been laid low beneath the cold clods of the valley, to rest till the last loud trump shall awake the sleeping dust to glory, honor, immortality and eternal life. We can say with the poet,

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep."

She has been a child of many prayers, and since she came to the years of understanding has been religiously inclined. She first made a profession of religion at the Winsted campmeeting in her 13th year, and lived for a time in the service of her Master; but from outside influences lost in a measure her peace. At a series of meetings held in Russell, by Elder Grant, she was much quickened, and went forward with a female friend from Ohio, with my brother and sister, (now in the far West) in baptism; and since, for the most part of the time, has been trying to serve the Lord, and especially since the Wilbraham campmeeting, has been ripening, and finishing her work on earth. The last time she attended meeting was at East Otis, the first Sunday in September; since then she has been failing rapidly. She had all done for her that could be done to arrest the disease by Dr. Fox, who attended by day and night, administering to her wants both spiritually and temporally. But her work is done. She rests in hope. Her Sunday school teacher called and conversed with her. She expressed her perfect readiness to live or die. The minister, Mr. Hinsdale, called twice, conversed and prayed with her. She told him she should sleep till Jesus comes.

Our house is lonely; our circle is broken. In her youth she is called to lie down in the dust, and bid farewell to friends so dear. We gather around the family altar—her place is vacant—her sweet voice is heard no more. She rests in hope, till the glorious morning dawns to be succeeded no more by night; when friends shall greet in a land where there is no more parting, no more sorrow, no more tears. Blessed day! long looked for by patriarchs, prophets, and the saints of every age and every land; when Jesus the great Life-Giver, shall come to make up his jewels; when that declaration of the word of God shall be fulfilled,—"This corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality. Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

Two days before she died, she called her mother and wanted her Bible and pencil. After her death, there was found written on a blank leaf these words of our Savior,—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Her funeral was attended by Mr. Hinsdale of Blandford, when a large and attentive audience listened to a deeply interesting discourse from the passage found in her Bible—"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." A large concourse followed her to her last resting place, where we took the last lingering look of one so lovely, and committed her to the silent grave to rest till the glorious morn shall dawn; when the last enemy shall be destroyed, and the captive go free; when the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, with songs of everlasting joy on their heads; when sorrow and sighing shall flee away forever.

DAVID BATES.

Blandford, Mass., Jan. 1st, 1859.

NANCY ALLEY departed this life Dec. the 12th ult.

She was a believer in the speedy coming of Jesus Christ. It pleased God to confine her upon a sick bed seven months; but she endured all patiently, saying, "I count it all joy if I may but win Christ.

Foreign News.

HALIFAX, Jan. 23.

The Cunard steamship Arabia, Capt. Stone, from Liverpool 3 30 P M. of 15th inst., arrived at this port at 10 30 this morning.

The London Times, in an editorial upon the Munroe doctrine, points out the extraordinary liberties taken by America with that document, and says: "It is rather too much to say that we, with half of North America in our lawful possession, must abstain from meddling in North American affairs; and it is a still stranger measure to found such a doctrine on the simple principles of political fraternity propounded by Munroe."

The last European Times remarks:—The absorbing feeling is, the hopes and fears of an European war. Even the meeting of Parliament, which is now fixed for the 3d of February, is secondary in importance to the topic which has taken possession of men's minds. In London and Paris the excitement of the money market, a few days back, was intense, and it is calculated that the public securities in this country alone have suffered a depreciation of sixty millions sterling—the result of the panic. Efforts have been made to calm the public mind in France, but the explanation of the Moniteur is not regarded as satisfactory, although it is evident that the alarm is rapidly wearing itself out. Since Tuesday there has been a decided reaction, notwithstanding what is regarded as the hostile tone of the King of Sardinia's speech, and the approaching marriage of Prince Napoleon to the eldest daughter of that monarch.

The Independance Belge states that the English Cabinet had given pledges of neutrality to the French government in the event of a war between Austria and France, provided the latter Power renounces all projects of territorial aggrandizement.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times writes: "There are two causes for the ill temper which was displayed by the Emperor Napoleon on New Year's day. The one is, that the Papal government has recently repeatedly requested the French Cabinet to withdraw its troops from Rome; and the other, that this government a few days ago announced its intention to send troops to the assistance of the garrison of Belgrade if the fortress should be attacked by the Servians."

The Paris correspondent of the Times says that Marshals charged with commands in great military districts, and Generals commanding military divisions who were on leave of absence, have received orders to return to their posts. He also says that Walowski protested energetically against the ominous impression that appears to rule supreme, and it is said was determined on retiring from a scene where moderation is no longer listened to.

Amongst other unauthenticated rumors from Paris are the following: That orders have been given to prepare over 100 transports—that Gen. McMahon is to command the army of Italy—and that 30,000 of the African contingent are to cross over to Italy from the African coast.

Prince Napoleon left Paris on the 13th for Turin, to espouse the Princess Clotilde, daughter of the King of Sardinia. The impression prevailed that this marriage would secure the support of France to assist Victor Emanuel in becoming King of Italy.

The Paris Press, the organ of Prince Napoleon, continued to indulge in warlike articles.

ITALY.

Rumors of disaffection in Lombardy continue unabated. Many persons were leaving Milan.

Every morning the police had to efface from the walls of houses such inscriptions as, "Death to Germans."

Troops quartered at Milan were exceedingly excited, and very strict discipline was necessary to prevent excesses.

The Times' Turin and Vienna correspondents believe the accounts of recent events in Italy to have been, in several instances, much exaggerated, and state that it is not true that some of the troops joined the people in seditious cries.

The official Piedmontese Gazette publishes the following note: "The official Gazette of Vienna, having announced the dispatch of reinforcements to Italy, the Piedmontese government has thought it its duty to bring the distant garrisons near to the frontiers of Lombardy, without, however, calling out the contingent." Three steamers with troops had arrived at Venice.

The advanced guard of the Austrian reinforcements entered Milan on the 10th. The Archduke Maximillian had quitted Milan, and Gen. Gyulai, the Military Governor, commanded in his absence.

The Piedmontese Chamber of Deputies had elected its officers from the ranks of the Liberal party, Signor Racozi being chosen President of the Chamber. Additional guns had been mounted on the citadel of Milan all pointed against the city.

A Milan letter says the chances of revolt were diminishing daily.

The news of the alliance of Prince Napoleon with the Sardinian Princess had produced great excitement among the Italians, who regarded it as a pledge of the united action of France and Sardinia in the affairs of Italy. It was expected that Prince Napoleon's presence at Genoa and Turin would lead to demonstrations of unmistakable character.

A letter from Rome, dated the 7th, says:—"The Pontifical Government has never ceased for the last two years to demand the departure of the French and Austrian armies of occupation. It gave as its reasons the perfect tranquility which prevails at Rome, and throughout the States of the Church. Moreover, it desired to accomplish a saving in its War Budget, which is enormous for so small a State. Ocular witnesses, who arrived here yesterday from Pavia, and Milan, announce that great agitation prevails in those towns. The Austrian authorities have adopted imprudent measures, which have irritated the people. It is a miracle if Lombardy be not on fire before the spring, as it was in 1848."

AUSTRIA.

The correspondent of the Times at Vienna says that the spirit of the people in Austria has been aroused by the hectoring of Sardinia and the domineering of France, and they are well pleased with the spirit displayed by the Emperor. No fewer than ten thousand men were sent by railway from Vienna on Saturday the 8th, and by Wednesday seventeen thousand more, including cavalry, were on the way to Italy. Eight batteries, with a hundred horses to each battery, were sent off on Monday. The celerity and ease with which troops were moved from one extremity of the Empire to the other, had excited general astonishment.

At one of the theatres a patriotic demonstration had taken place, caused by some allusions in the piece.

It is stated that the Rear Admiral commanding the Austrian squadron in the Adriatic, who was about to proceed to the Levant, had been ordered to return to Trieste.

The Austrian corps of observation on the Servian frontier is not above four thousand strong, and will not be reinforced.

Rumors were current in Vienna of the discovery of a formidable conspiracy in Cracow. Numerous arrests had been made, and many of the prisoners are said to be Russians.

One of the reports states that the fortress of Cracow was to have been surrendered to the Russians. There is believed to have been considerable exaggeration in the reports.

A Vienna despatch of the 5th, says: "The report that Austria is likely to send troops to the fortress of Belgrade has caused a panic here; but you may be sure she will not do so, unless with the consent of the other parties to the treaty of Paris.

TURKEY.

The Turkey Telegraph Cable is successfully laid to Constantinople and the Dardanelles, and is to be extended to Candia and Egypt in the spring.

PRUSSIA.

Le Nord says that Prussia and Germany will remain merely spectators so long as Austria shall have only the Italians against her, and by that neutrality expect to force France to remain neutral also, and the more so that England will adopt a similar policy. As to Russia, she will take part neither for or against Austria.

SPAIN.

A Madrid telegraph of the 8th ult. to the Daily News says: "The ministry declare that Spain will never sell Cuba, and protest against the insulting hypothesis to the contrary implied in the American President's message.

The Monarquia considers Buchanan's message mere election claptrap, and a continuation of that which he made at Ostend, to obtain himself partisans for the Presidency, but thinks some other Democrat may outbid him, and that that may lead to serious complications. It believes that more fillibustering expeditions will be connived at, but argues if the little Republic of Costa Rica was able to defeat Walker, who took over to Nicaragua a much larger force than any likely to go to Cuba, but little fear need be entertained about Cuba, garrisoned by the flower of the Spanish Army, and provided with a flotilla large enough to cut off all supplies.

For the Crisis.

THE NEW YEAR.

One more is past—how swiftly do they fly,
Like shadows frail that melt in air away;
Like clouds that flit o'er evening's troubled sky,
They still elude our gaze, they will not stay.
They pass away—these fleeting years—
Blended with gladness and with tears;
E'en like the summer's flowing stream,
Or like the night's bewildering dream.
And whither do we tend? Is it the way
Of Heaven's light wherein our footsteps go?
And is it Bethlehem's holy star whose ray
Guides us in this dark world of woe?
Or does a sunny pathway smile
Before us, and our thoughts beguile,
A broad way, vainly strewed with flowers,—
Is that smooth path of evil ours?
Thou God of love, whose years fail not,
Eternal, undecaying, mighty One,
Frail, frail are we, and changes mark our lot,
But changes reach not to thy high abode.
In light and deathless majesty
Thou ever wert, and shall be still;
But we—a moment sees us here,
The next—we're gone, we disappear.
O God, on thee we call, if years pass on,
To teach our hearts to number them aright;
Grant us the only hope that cannot die;
Flame our souls with pure, celestial light,
That leads by grace to an eternal day;
That we thy glorious face may see,
And praise thee better far than here,
Through bright, eternal, blissful years.
The day this one began—some took our hand,
And wished it happy unto us; and many more
The same they wished. And on, and on, they went.
But in return, the compliment we could not turn,
Our heart thrilled at the thought; yet years of sin
In this cold-hearted, bitter world of woe?
To one we answered no,—ere years have passed,
We hope to see and join the blood-washed band.

For the Crisis.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 10.

MY DEAR SISTER:—There are various opinions respecting the degree of moral perfection unto which the christian may attain in this life. Some believe that it is impossible for an individual to live without committing sin daily. They contend that all we do is mixed with sin. Others believe that an individual may be perfectly justified before God, and maintain this state, but yet the soul is constantly warring against inward depravity, from which there will be no release until death. This they denominate the "christian warfare." Others take the ground that Jesus "is able to save unto the uttermost;" that there is power sufficient in the atonement to expiate for actual transgressions, and also to cleanse the soul from all unrighteousness. That the individual may not only be justified in regard to his offences, but also sanctified wholly, so that the native tendencies to evil may be removed, and the entire bent of the mind be turned toward that which is good, yet, like Adam and Eve, exposed to temptation from Satan, and liable to fall, and subject to error. Others contend that it is possible for the person to be so saved as to be in no further danger of falling into sin.

Now I purpose, dear sister, to examine these different phases of belief by the light of divine truth, and whichever harmonizes with that, to receive it. This was not my design when I wrote you last, but to bring one only to the test. I think now that it may be more instructive and profitable to examine them each, with a disposition to "buy the truth, and sell it not."

1st. Does the Bible represent the christian as being an habitual sinner? The question to be settled is not whether modern professed christians do daily sin; but we will come to the Bible standard of christianity. We will examine the proofs brought in support of this position—that all christians do habitually sin. 1. Kings 8: 46. Solomon prays: "If they sin against thee, (for there is no man that sinneth not,") &c. Eccl. 7: 20. "For there is not a just man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not." It is certain from these texts that Solomon believed all men in his day to be sinners. Rom. 8: 10—"As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one." Somebody wrote thus; let us turn to the original. "There is none that doeth good, no, not one." So wrote David, the inspired prophet of God. He is speaking of a class who "are corrupt," whose works are "abominable," and says, "there is none that doeth good. They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the Lord." These "workers of iniquity" are, not the Lord's people, for they are oppressors of his people, eating them up, as it is figuratively represented.

These illustrations are taken from under the law, "which could not make the comers thereunto perfect;" and we will now refer to the proof texts taken from the New Testament. Rom. 7: 14–25.—"For we know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin. For that which I do, I allow not; for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.... I find then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin." Those who adduce this language of the apostle Paul, in proof that all christians do habitually sin, consider him as speaking of himself in a regenerate state. That, while with the mind he served God, with the flesh he served sin. That thus it is with all christians. When they would do good, evil is constantly present, and bringing them into bondage. Sin, dwelling in them, leads them to do what they wish not to do, and hence the warfare.

It seems, however, to be a warfare in which sin, and not grace, has the ascendancy. How strongly does the apostle express it by a metaphor; "I am carnal, sold under sin." As the slave is in bondage, and under the dominion of the man to whom he is sold, so Paul was under the dominion of sin, and contrary to his own will, made to do that which he had no desire to do, thus bringing him into a captivity so irksome that he exclaims, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Sold to sin! Taken captive! All of his struggles were unavailing! He is a captive, and a slave, and to add to his wretchedness, is bound to a dead body, and forced to drag it about with him, a putrid, rotten carcass, until death relieves him from his misery.

Very strong are the metaphors employed by the apostle to represent his wretched condition, and then he closes by asking, "Who shall deliver me?" and exclaimed, "Thank God! through Jesus Christ our Lord!" What! has he found in Christ a deliverer from his bondage? Yes! and with a heart exultant at the thought, he at once changes his theme, and goes on to describe the freedom and blessedness of one who has been emancipated through Jesus Christ! Having shown in the boldest language the insufficiency of the law to save him from sin, he goes on to describe the power and efficiency of the gospel to save men. As these descriptions are antagonistic, they cannot refer to the same condition. But we must defer further comments until our next. In the meantime, allow me to request you to carefully and prayerfully examine this subject, for an error here would be a dangerous one. Yours as ever, M. D W.

☞ I have long ago been convinced that it was better to love men than to hate them; that one would be more likely to convince them of wrong belief by showing a cordial sympathy with their welfare, than by nipping and pinching them with logic. And although I do not disdain, but honor philosophy applied to religion, I think that the world just now needs the Christian Heart more than any thing else. And, even if the only and greatest question were the propagation of right theology, I am confident that right speculative views will grow up faster and firmer in the summer of true christian loving, than in the rigorous winter of solid, congealed orthodoxy, or the blustering March of controversy.—Beecher.

PROMISES TO GOD.—There is a tradition of Ovid, the poet, that when his father was about to punish him for writing poetry, he promised his father never to make a verse, and made a verse in his very promise. When I do solemnly promise my Heavenly Father to sin no more, I sin in my promise. I say my prayers as the Jew eats the passover, in haste. And although in bodily actions motion is the cause of warmth, the more speed I make in my prayers the colder I am in my devotion.—Thos. Fuller.

Alcohol an Elixir of Life.

In the days of Alchemy there were three principal objects of scientific pursuit;—the Universal Solvent, the Philosopher's Stone, and the Elixir of Life. The two first have been given up as worthless if they were found. Upon the discovery of alcohol, with its wondrous effects upon the physical system, the hope was for some time cherished that immortality had been ever more brought to light. But the general opinion has long been settling against the tempting beverage, as making feeble life shorter instead of longer.

I think I can now prove that this popular verdict is a mistake. I have found logic for it, quite as good as that which performs certain marvelous feats with which collegians are familiar, and for which I find the sanction of the greatest of the Fathers,—Augustine. I will give the argument.

We know that it is often said that extinction of being cannot be the final penalty of sin, because the word death is sometimes used in a metaphorical sense. Death does not kill the soul, it is said, for men are said to be "dead in trespasses and sins" while they are yet alive; and hence, so far as the meaning of this word is concerned, they may live forever. This metaphorical sense of the word is claimed particularly in Eph. 2: 1–5; Col. 2: 13; 1 Tim. 5: 6; Rom. 6: 2; 8: 10: and, most important of all the passages, Gen. 2: 17.

To this I have already replied that in some, if not all of these passages, the future is anticipated as already present, by the figure of speech called prolepsis, which often occurs in the Bible, and which does not make any difference in the nature of the death spoken of in the passages in question. To support this view, I have already adduced nineteen commentators and ancient versions, and I am now prepared to add, for various instances, the names of Augustine, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Erasmus, Zanebius, Piscator, Calixtus, Calvin, Beza, Turretin, Grotius, Gomar, Zegerus, Estius, Parens, Toletus, Vitringa, Bengel, Michaelis, Wahl, Ruckert, Reiche, Uster, Fritzsche, Kauffer, Flatt, Meyer, Tholuck, Hammond, Clarke, Macknight.

"Midnight!" some one is ready to echo. Well, the army of authorities may frighten into silence some whom it does not enlighten.

I should say here, before I come to the great argument, that most of those who hold the immortality of "them that perish," do not offer the metaphorical sense of the word death as proving said immortality. They do not think of deducing immortal life directly out of "spiritual death." That would be so obviously a violent and unwarranted procedure, that it might cause some staggering and misgiving. They commonly offer their interpretation not as proving their whole case, but as a foil to meet the doctrine that the death of the wicked finally kills. And I expected until lately to find our opponents ever using their argument thus moderately and modestly. But I am quite disappointed. I have just found Augustine going further, and "carrying the war into Africa," as if that country were his own; as indeed it was, greatly to its honor. I honor him no less, though we may trust him less, for the following argument: "The life of thy body is thy soul; the life of thy soul is thy God. Just as the body dies when the soul is gone, which is its life, so the soul dies when sundered from God, who is its life. The soul is therefore certainly immortal, because it lives even when dead. For we may say of the soul when it has lost its God, that which Paul said of the woman that lives in pleasure, 'She is dead while she liveth.' (1 Tim. 5: 6.)"—Essays on the Gospel of John, Essay xlvii. 8.

Such is the argument, illustration and quotation. And now for the inferences.

1. Not only is the soul immortal, but if the illustration is good, the body is also immortal. For as the death of the one illustrates the death of the other, so the life of the other represents the life of the one. The soul parted from its life does not perish; so the body deprived of its life does not decay. Practical conclusion. We ought to die as soon as possible, and become wholly immortal.

2. The woman that lives in pleasure is immortal already. Hence, for those who prefer it, pleasure may be as good an elixir of life as suicide would be.

3. The drunkard is immortal. For it is proverbially said of him: "He has destroyed himself." But he is not dead yet, and he cannot be more than "destroyed;" so he will live forever—he will never sink to a drunkard's grave.—Q. E. D.

So I think that, logically, the Elixir of Life is discovered. And discovered, too, with conditions that must be very pleasing to multitudes; for nothing is required in the way of virtue, or spirituality, or any thing that pertains to the "soul's health."

This last phrase may suggest some reflection, whether the discovery is as good actually as it seems to be logically. For if the body's sickness threatens its life, so when there is no "soul's health," its very life may be in danger, for aught we know. At least we should not be too ready to infer its immortality because it is sick yet not dead. In fact, when we say that the drunkard has "destroyed" himself, we mean to say that his case is almost if not quite hopeless. His destruction completes itself in the drunkard's grave. So "spiritual death," granting the phrase, may naturally foreshadow and find its consummation in an eternal death that leaves no trace of life nor gleam of hope. C. F. H.

For the Crisis.

My Experience;

OR, WHAT I HAVE SEEN AND FELT OF SPIRITUALISM.—No. 3.

Spiritualism not only ignores the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Savior of men, and repudiates the Holy Scriptures, but is hostile to all ecclesiastical associations. This is seen in the efforts made by them, in every possible way, to prejudice the minds of men, and to destroy their confidence in them. Teaching men that such organizations consist of ignorant, superstitious and hypocritical men and women, who only seek to usurp authority over them for the purpose of dictating to them what they shall do, or not do, think, or not think; and hence deprive them of their rights as men and women.

Again; they refer them to the advantages of their creeds, which is in effect to do as their mediums and reasons dictate. Now as to the ignorance of those who are christians and the wisdom of Spiritualists, I think a few remarks will place that matter at rest.

The christian believes, and confides in, the sacred Scriptures, as a divine revelation from God, and as being the only one which has any claim to divine authority; and hence as being the only reliable guide, and containing the only reliable instructions necessary to be observed, in order to secure eternal life; and for this faith be is called a fool, and termed by them (Spiritualists) as ignorant. They ignore the whole thing. This is what they term "wisdom."

Christians confide in the death and resurrection and merits of Christ for eternal redemption, this being the only revealed method of salvation, and for this they are called ignorant.

Spiritualists ignore him as a Savior; herein they think is their wisdom. Now I ask who are the fools, and who are the ignorant? They teach that what their reason dictates as being morally right, is right to them. O! how men will resort to every kind of theories, and how hard they will labor to establish themselves in error. I ask, is it true that human reason alone can be relied upon as a safe moral guide? Nay, do we not know in our hearts that it is not? Have we not sufficient argument to establish this point?

Look at the calendar of crime, as committed among men in this country. Has not the murderer, the drunkard, the licentious and wicked, of every kind and grade, reason as well as they? Is reason to them a sure guide to morality and happiness? If it is not adequate to the task in them, what evidence have you that it will be in your case? I confess that reason would gladly lead us aright, would gladly perform her office, but she does not control, neither indeed can she. She cannot annul. She is in league with the passions, which she ought to control, or at least as one remarks, treats them with as much indulgence as a mother does her spoiled child. This treason is our misfortune, and evinces to us the frailty of human reason; hence to depend upon it as a moral guide, is in effect to depend upon our passions.

Again; when they speak of the ignorance of christians, I understand them as speaking of their inability to discern the light of Spiritualism (as they term it) which has made such great discoveries to them.

But I would here ask what real religious advantage have they gained by embracing their Spiritual philosophy, and what knowledge have they gained by it, which makes them wise above their fellows? This thought is worthy of passing notice, at least. Have they learned to know what is implied in the real enjoyment of christianity? Have they peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ? Have they the spirit of adoption richly dwelling in their hearts, and its fruits, which are love, joy, peace, love to God and man, to saint and sinner, to friends and foes? In a word, what do they know of the joys of pardoned sin? Nothing. I repeat it, nothing. They are yet in their sins, and will remain in them as long as they ignore the Lord Jesus Christ as the Savior of sinners! and further, they know nothing of the joys and hope of which we speak. And yet they deem christians fools and ignorant. Judge ye who are the wise. Their light is darkness, and we need no better evidence of their loving it than they give us, in that they abide in it. True, there are those among them, possibly who, like myself, were drawn under its Satanic influence, and who, though they may see the light in the distance, yet have not moral power to reach it. To such let me say, pray! for prayer and faith in Christ can alone save you. Fly from the den of pollution into which you are fallen, by flying to Him who alone can save you.

This harmonial philosophy proposes to secure universal harmony and happiness. How, I ask, is it doing this work?

I answer, by sowing discord in families; by separating husbands and wives, and encouraging and abetting licentious conduct.

In proof of these facts, I propose to detail to you what I have seen while among them, also what they teach upon those subjects, and what I know to be the prevailing sentiment of Spiritualists concerning these points. ADOLPHUS.

Camp Meetings.

As the interest in community increases to hear on the second advent of Christ and attendant doctrines, as we hold them, we, as a people, occupy a position in the religious world that calls upon us to give the reasons for our hope, and let our light shine as it has not for a number of years. There are double the calls that can be headed. New doors are opening in every direction. What shall be done? is the inquiry from every honest laborer in this great field. The coming year is destined to be an important one, and an understanding effort ought to be made in harmony, as far as possible, to unite all the well meaning and laboring brethren in one combined and general effort. As some of the preaching brethren have requested my opinion, I have given it privately, which they wished me to make public for the brethren to think of. It is as follows:—

To have three general campmeetings in different localities; and unite all in the great work of spreading this subject before the world, with some general understanding one with another. This would be coming into some kind of order among those that are looking for the general good. As I travel around, I find many that bless God that they ever attended the campmeetings. They have taken new courage, and gone to work understandingly and effectually. I think the state of the cause in different localities requires three general campmeetings;—say, for instance, as there is one located at Wilbraham, have another in the vicinity of Rutland, Vt.; another in the vicinity of Fairfield, Me. These three points would accommodate many that would not be able to come to the Wilbraham meeting. By request, I drop these thoughts for the consideration of the brethren concerned, that wish for the general good. These remarks, thus early, I hope will set the brethren to thinking, acting and writing on this subject.

COMING TO CHRIST.—Come in, come in to Christ, and see what you want, and find it in him; he is the short cut, as we used to say, and the nearest way to an out-gate of all your burdens. I dare avouch, you shall be dearly welcome to him. Angels' pens, angels' tongues, nay, as many worlds of angels as there are drops of water in all the seas and fountains and rivers of the earth, cannot paint him out to you. I think his sweetness, since I was a prisoner, has swelled upon me to the greatness of two heavens. Oh for a soul as wide as the utmost circle of the highest heaven that containeth all, to contain his love!—Rutherford.

Scriptural Inscriptions.

In a letter just received from a friend in London, we have a brief description of a look through Westminster Abbey. It embraces some points, though not novel, are yet too good to be confined to the family circle. An extract reads as follows:

"We have at length visited the [illegible] of Great Britain—Westminster Abbey, where the coronation of all the Kings and Queens of England has taken place. Even when a monarch has been crowned elsewhere—as in the case of Henry III.—it was thought proper to have the ceremony repeated. Strange as it may appear, there is an opportunity for those who wish, to try the effect of sitting in the identical chair where the important offices of crowning and enthroning have taken place, and which is never removed from the Abbey. I do not think I quite appreciated the privilege, (of sitting in this seat of royalty) for there was such a multitude of thoughts crowding through my mind, that this seemed an unimportant affair. In order to estimate this noble specimen of architecture, it is necessary to see it; and it may then be justly said to be a study for months. There are two church services performed each day in the week, but there is a stereotyped chilliness connected with them that would never be in accordance with my feelings.

"The ground that encloses the building is paved with tombstones, while the structure itself is filled with chapels, bearing the names of the different sovereigns—their tombs, monumental effigies in all positions, tablets, medallions, niches filled with angels, heraldic devices and escutcheons—all of the finest and most perfect sculpture that the mind can conceive.

"I was much interested in reading some of the inscriptions—particularly in what is designated 'The Poet's Corner,'—many of which run as follows: 'Died in the full hope and with the blessed assurance of the SECOND COMING of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ,' &c.

"This doctrine, though considered by some delusive, did not originate during the present age. Nay; this was the precise doctrine of the Apostles, stated scores of times: Heb. 9: 28: 1 Thess. 4: 13–18; Titus 2: 11–13; 1 Cor. 1: 47, &c. This was 'the hope of the promise of God made to the fathers.' Acts 24: 6–8. This hope of the resurrection inspired all the worthies named. Heb. 11: 4–40.

"The patriarch Job prayed that his words, expressive of his hope, might 'be written in a book, and inscribed in the Book, by an iron pen, forever;' Job 10: 20–26. In 'the Book' of books, the Bible, they are written; and in the rocks of Ghoreb, some twenty-five feet high, this doctrine is inscribed, though in slightly varied language."

The point of interest in this extract lies here: This doctrine of Holy Scripture, so oft ignored, held vaguely or denied, has been, by the sculptor's imperishable pen, inscribed in marble, and placed among the most enduring monuments of royalty, in the very centre of all that is most honored, amid the highest scenes of christian civilization. This point, so suggestive and so replete with interest to all, deserves to be preserved. J. B. C.

INVOCATION.

Thou God of Abraham,
And God of Isaac too,
Be thou our God in this our day,
And in the earth made new.

There is no God beside;
Eternal, thou art true;
Beneath thy wing may we abide,
And glory keep in view.

Long have the prophets slept
Who pointed out our day,
But yet how long, O Lord, ere they
With us thy glory see!

Shall we with them yet sleep,
And moulder back to clay,
Ere those bright glories on us beam,
That long, long looked for day?

May faith, and hope, and love,
Keep bright the flame within,
And patience all our graces prove—
Our light be made to shine.

For the Crisis.

Rome as it Was; Rome as it is Not; Rome as it Is.

BY ELDER S. S. BREWER.

NO. I.

BRO. GRANT:—I wish to present through the Crisis the reasons for dissenting from my former opinions concerning Rev. 17th, as I consider them at variance with facts too plain not to be seen by careful observation.

First. I did once believe that the Leopard beast of Rev. 13, with seven heads and ten horns, and the scarlet colored beast of Rev. 17, with seven heads and ten horns, were the same power. I do not believe it now.

Second. I did once believe that the beast that was, and is not, and yet is, was the Napoleonic dynasty. I most emphatically disbelieve it now, and because facts compel me to renounce it.

My reason for changing my opinion on the first is this: A beast like unto a leopard is not a scarlet beast. I tried to harmonize it with the idea of becoming scarlet through crime and slaughter. My present opinion is this, concerning the 10th and 11th verses. There had five kings, or forms of the PAGAN ROMAN government, fallen when John wrote; one was, the other was not yet come; and when he came he was to continue a short space. Permit me here to quote from DR. A. CLARKE. After a very critical examination of this subject, he remarks:

"The seven heads of the beast are, therefore, the following: 1. The Regal Power. 2. The Dictatorship. 3d. The power of the Prætors. 4. The Consulate. 2. Triumvirate. 6. The Imperial power, and the Patriciate, (and when he cometh he must continue a short space,) the seventh form of government as only to remain a short time, which was actually the case; for from its first rise to independent power to its utter extinction, there passed only about forty-five years,—a short time in comparison to the duration of several of the preceding forms of government."

It is, so far as I am acquainted with writers on the Apocalypse, a universally admitted fact that the great Red Dragon of Rev. 12: 3, symbolized Pagan Rome, and as the Revelator presents it with seven heads, when the act of transfer is made to the beast like unto a leopard, there is an end to that power in its pagan form. I shall now present what I most positively believe to be the plain, legitimate sense of the text.

When John wrote, five forms of government had passed away; one, the sixth, was in power, and the seventh did continue but a short space. And now we are to find in the ROMAN government another form, and that form is to be THE EIGHTH, and of the SEVEN. Is it not a fact that ROMAN CATHOLICISM is another form of Roman government? Please notice the 18th verse: "The woman which thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth."

There is an identity concerning the beast of Rev. 17: 3; namely, the scarlet colored beast. Prof. Murdock, in his Syriac translation, renders it thus: "I saw a woman sitting on a RED BEAST of prey." That red beast of prey is the Roman government, the eighth, and of the seven. The revelator in vision sees the leopard power with seven heads. Now, is it not legitimate to conclude that that power continues a leopard beast during all its time of receiving and losing its heads; that is, during its existence? or does the leopard change his spots? Is it not a leopard beast from beginning to end? I most conscientiously believe it is; if so, the scarlet is another beast.

The reader will bear in mind that the WOMAN is seen seated on the SCARLET or RED BEAST; a beast and a rider distinct from each other. That the pope of ROME has swayed a sceptre of tyranny over rulers, kings and emperors; that he has been a priest-king of the most desperate stamp, I will not stop here to discuss. And, likewise, it has been Rome that has carried the church, the woman, through all her bloody crusades; all her bishops, archbishops and functionaries receive their power from Rome. A Romanist glories in the name of Rome. Never did a Cæsar feel more pride in that talismanic name, than the pope, priests, bishops, archbishops and arch fiends of Rome do this very day. Rome is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end of their faith.

There is one peculiar characteristic in the dress of the priest-king of Rome. Whether the revelator designed that we should obtain an identity from it or not, I will leave you, dear reader, to decide.

Says Albert Barnes, in his Notes on this subject:

"I caused this inquiry to be made of an intelligent gentleman, who had passed much time in Rome—without his knowing my design—what would strike a stranger on visiting Rome, or what would be likely particularly to arrest his attention as remarkable there; and he unhesitatingly replied, the scarlet color of the dress of the cardinals—of their hats, and cloaks, and stockings, being always of this color. It is the color of the carriages of the cardinals. The entire body of the carriage being scarlet, and the trappings of the horses the same. On occasions of public festivals and processions, scarlet is suspended from the windows of the houses along which processions pass. The inner color of the cloak of the pope is scarlet. The carriage is scarlet. The carpet on which he treads is scarlet. A large part of the dress of the body guard of the pope is scarlet; and no one can take up a picture of Rome without seeing that this color is predominant. I looked through a volume of engravings representing the principal officers and public persons of Rome. There were few in which the scarlet color was not found as constituting some part of their apparel; in not a few the scarlet color prevailed almost entirely. . . . I conclude, therefore, that if it be admitted that it was intended to represent Papal Rome in the vision, the precise description would have been adopted which is found here."

To say the least, there is a most striking coincidence in the matter.

Wakefield renders the 11th verse thus: "And the beast that was, but is not, is HIMSELF both an eighth and one of the seven, and is going to destruction." There is a meaning in the expression—is going to destruction; or, as it reads in our translation,—and goeth into perdition. When pagan Rome is presented in the 12th chapter, it is there called that old serpent. And the reason is plain to my mind. Serpents change their skin, or crawl out of the same every season. So that serpentine government passed through seven changes. But in this, the EIGHTH, he will go to perdition—to destruction. Romanism claims infallibility—never has erred—cannot err. There is, to my mind, force in the expression, taken in the above sense. When John saw the woman seated on the scarlet colored beast, he wondered with great admiration; then he is told the mystery of the woman and the beast that carrieth her. Mark the position and the time in the wilderness; not after she comes out of the wilderness, but in the wilderness. There and then he sees the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. Before the Napoleonic dynasty had a being, there the eighth form of Rome, under the priest-king, statesman and warrior, the pope of Rome, is seen ruling the kingdoms of Europe, commanding kings to kiss his foot, and speaking LIKE A DRAGON. It was marvelous to John; he wondered to see a church, professing to believe the Scriptures, supported by such a political tyrant, and declared, that "they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is." Now mark, the woman is seen seated on the beast in the wilderness. Is not that a fact? If so, the eighth was in existence. Consequently, by no method of reasoning whatever, can France under Napoleon fill the mould of prophecy. It is clear that in the SEVEN referred to by the revelator, he did not mean the seven heads of the leopard beast, which were all different nations; if he did, I shall prove in my next that France is not the eighth.

All wonder when they see Rome, once the mistress of the world in its political and religious power, then is not, having transferred its power to the GREEK EMPEROR; and then Rome yet is; in the eighth century, when the pope declared himself an independent monarch, which created more astonishment, in all probability, than ever Louis Napoleon did or can create.

"I Don't Believe in Covering Up Sin."

You don't, eh? Well, neither do I. But if you think it any great credit to you to act like the devil, and then pretend you do it to avoid hypocrisy, you will be mistaken. The fact is, friend, there are a great many things about you and I that ought to be covered up, yes, buried so deep that the devil never can dig them up with his longest hoe; and it is your business to cover them up till you can kill them out. Don't flatter yourself with the idea that when you have got the devil in you, it helps the matter to act it out. No, sir. Hold your tongue,—it's too hot to speak properly. Let those evil words die in your own heart. It is bad to have firebrands, arrows and death inside of you, but it is worse to scatter them all about. Keep your body under. Throw away those poisonous narcotics. Offer your tobacco a sacrifice to Satan, and never use it any more. Then live temperately, keep your nerves quiet, and learn to bear and endure. Swallow down a few of your little provocations, put a bridle on your tongue, and then hold on to it.

"Don't want to hide any thing?" You might as well lay aside your clothes as your common sense. The fact is, you do want to hide a great many things. And if all your faults were written on your tongue, you would n't open your mouth three times a day; and if they were marked on your forehead, you'd pull your hat down till you could n't see out of your eyes.

"Must let it all come out!" Why don't you aim a loaded gun right into the midst of your family, and "let it all come out?" Why don't you punch up an uncaged tiger and tell him to "let it all come out?" Why don't you stand before a loaded cannon and say, "Fire! let it all come out; don't keep back any thing; I hate hypocrisy?"

A tree is known by its fruits. He that doeth righteousness is righteous. You need not undertake to find fault with others who don't act worse than they want to, for fear some one will think them better than they are. Ah! friend, you are backslidden. How many motes you do see in others' eyes since you got that horrid beam in your own. Pull out the beam! Then go tell your brother your fault between you and him alone. Tut! tut! not a word! I don't want to hear any thing about your paltry squabbles! Go do your duty, and then you will find things nearer right. When you get sober, the trees and brick houses won't chase you, nor the ground fly up and strike you in the head.

Church Responses.

As I read in last week's Crisis an interesting letter from South Wilbraham, mentioning the spiritual practice of responding in prayer, I could but reflect how little understood and appreciated is this ancient and scriptural practice of God's people, both under the old and new dispensation.

Many who profess to love God, treat this matter, both by words and acts, with an air of disdain, as though it were a mere human form, wholly unauthorized by the God of the Bible. But if such would carefully look into that Word which is to judge us at the last day, they would find this practice originated with the "church in the wilderness," by a special and divine command. Deut. 27: 15. Macknight shows this practice was transferred to the christian church at its beginning; which plainly appears from the Apostle's argument in 1 Cor. 14: 16, 17, where he forbids praying in an unknown tongue in the church, unless there be an interpreter, and adduces the following, as a reason why they should pray in a language the entire church could understand; viz: the "unlearned," those not understanding the language, would not know when to say "Amen," or, as Macknight has it, would not know where to introduce the audible Amen!

Now this plainly shows that the Apostolic church did practice what the church in the wilderness were positively commanded to do; that is, the church, the lay members, gave their recognition not only to the word of God, when reiterated by God's servant, but to those prayers in keeping with his word. When God's ministers pronounced blessings, or repeated God's denunciations against certain sins, the church were not to sit like so many marble statues, or to appear as though Morpheus presided over them, or so fearful they should infringe upon popular etiquette they could not even move a muscle to manifest their interest in the cause. But by their gestures, as well as voice, they were to show they appreciated these spiritual blessings, and heartily concurred in the declarations of the Almighty.

Moses gave directions to the children of Israel relative to their mode of worship when they had passed over Jordan. He commanded the Levites to reiterate a code of divine laws, and at the close of each declaration, "all the people should answer and say Amen."

Then the same thing is repeated in Nehemiah, with the addition of very emphatic gestures. O read it, ye stiff, stereotyped, ice-bound professors, who are so fearful of innovations as to remind one of the manner of the contumacious Pharisee towards the Son of God. But I forget. Such will not probably read this. But, my brethren and sisters, let us read the 8th chapter of Nehemiah, where Ezra stood upon the pulpit of wood made for the purpose, and read the law of God to the men and women that could hear with understanding. Observe their reverence. As soon as "he opened it," (that is the book) "all the people stood up." And theirs was not physical activity alone. See! "And the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law":—"And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: and they bowed their heads, and worshiped the Lord with their faces to the ground."

Dear brethren and sisters, shall we ever again appear dull and inactive, when God's word is repeated, or prayer is offered to his divine Majesty? But, says one, if God's sheep do thus, they will be annoyed sometimes with the voice of goats. Well, what good cause has not been annoyed with a Judas? Have we not reason to believe very many receive the ordinance of baptism, and come around the table of the Lord, who are really unworthy? But shall God's children refuse to comply with his commands because some abuse his ordinances?

Reform.

"No man putteth new wine into old bottles."—LUKE 5: 37.

Reform, social, moral, and intellectual reform! Its need—its accomplishment—its benefits, are often presented to the reflective mind. It is needed, and has been ever since Adam partook of the forbidden fruit, and will be until the judgment day. Because it is needed, and because many benefits may be derived from a true reformation, it is certainly laudable to seek means to produce it. Therefore many strive, study, lecture, and write. And yet society is corrupt, morals are depraved, and intellects are dwarfed Time and talent are spent in suggesting and developing various improvements for the present benefit of mankind.

One says, "educate." But what is education? Simply power. And so they educate, and the result is, tricks and villainy, fraud and licentiousness, flow a perfect stream from our halls of learning. Another says, "govern." Then laws are put forth, and what then? Honesty and justice are dethroned, and bribery and corruption are in their stead. Another cries, "moral suasion," and others, "association," "spiritual progression," &c. And thus men of laudable desires, but weak in judgment, of benevolent hearts, but lacking true wisdom, study, invent, and introduce to society new schemes, founded upon new principles, and talk largely of reform and progress. Then they look for improvement in man's condition as a result of their labors, but behold an attendant curse ever follows. Being unable to account for this, they either renew their study to search out the defect, or give up the work in despair. And now, after years of laborious research and continued failure, while "men's hearts (are) failing them for fear," the cry comes up from perishing millions, "who can help?" Let us hold a council on the matter. Let us invoke Divine Wisdom to preside, while we retrospect the past, inquire into the present, and seek wisdom for the future.

In glancing at the past, we find society has continually undergone changes, which have been, either the result of schemes of evil minded men, or of social reformers. We follow through the many changes that have been wrought, down to the present, and we find that inventions and discoveries have been brought to bear upon man's condition, until such an acquired velocity has been obtained, and such an impetus given, that the whole civilized world stands breathless with anxiety, while the train of circumstances, drawn by the locomotive of human knowledge and invention, is urging them on to a swifter and as sure destruction as ever awaited a barbarous nation. The track is the same it ever has been. The condition therefore is just as bad, for the result will be the same.

No wonder the cry goes up, "who is sufficient for these things?" Let us see what reformers have been about meanwhile. Their object has been to overcome the evil tendency of things. But have they ever stopped to inquire into the origin of this evil? Surely if they had, their ardor would have abated somewhat, and they would have been less sanguine of success. For certain conditions of society which outwardly appeared beautiful to them, would have been found to be "full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness," and they would not have needed the sad lessons of experience to tell them that their human efforts would be futile. We find discord in society. We wish to prevent it. We find imperfection. We wish to obviate it. We find sorrow and disquiet. We wish to bring relief. Let us seek the cause of these, that we may the more utterly remove them. "But," says a reformer, "it won't do. Evil exists. This is the starting point of every reformer, and the object has not been to destroy evil entirely, for it can not be done. It can only be kept in subjection." Not so fast, my friend. We wish to be thorough in the work, that it may remain, and our object not be defeated as you have been. You only sought to regulate. Now, in all common sense we inquire, how can you regulate an irregularity? This is the prime cause of your failure. You say evil cannot be eradicated. When I have come to this conclusion, I will do as you have done; give up in despair.

We started to search out the cause of evil. We find it exists in this world in consequence of Adam's yielding to temptation, and its sum is death. "There," exclaims our friend again, "you have your match now. Remove death if you can." True, it must be removed ere a thorough reform can be produced. And, as we have invoked Divine Wisdom to aid us, we will seek God's help in this matter. He is willing, and has already done much to bring to pass the very thing we seek. And what he has done remains fixed, and when the work is finished it will remain through all eternity. And here is another cause of your failure. There was no God in the work. You sought to educate, but for what purpose? To exalt men by giving them exalted ideas of themselves. So did Satan when he said, "ye shall be as gods knowing good and evil." Therefore a Boston preacher prayed in public not long since, "May we, O God, never think meanly of ourselves."

Educate! but let not ambition be the stimulus entirely—the ruling principle. Remember—"He that exalteth himself shall be abased." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." And because men have tried to control, or "govern," and not eradicate—to exalt, or "educate," and not to teach true wisdom, the past has been a failure—the present is evil, and the future is dark and threatening. But who is able to eradicate? Who can teach true wisdom? God alone. And here we have reached the root of the matter. Now we are ready to lay the foundation. But we find it already laid, and "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Now, let us be careful how we build.

"Well," says one, "we are ready to aid you with heart and hand. But we warn you that structures have already been reared on that same foundation, and although, in some individual instances, they may have accomplished their end, yet the great mass, and, I may say, the majority of those who have aided to rear them have not been benefited in the least." We thank you for the warning, and will heed it. Perhaps it was owing to the quality of the material they used that they failed, therefore let us have good material. We want nothing perishable, for we want the work to abide. We want a structure in which Death cannot be found; which shall be reared "under the whole heaven," and which shall include every particle of earth. To accomplish this work in man's heart, we want but one material, and that is, Truth. Truth is the word of God, therefore it will abide forever. Truth is good—error is evil. Truth and error cannot unite, for they are opposites; therefore wherever truth is, evil is not. Hence, if our entire structure is composed of truth, evil is eradicated, which is just what we desire. "But," says our friend, "do we not often see a union of the two?" Never, in reality. They may be said to be so in creeds and laws, but truth is of God—error is of Satan, and "ye cannot serve God and mammon." If the following of a course said to be marked out by uniting truth and error brings one to evil, he has followed error; if to God, he has followed truth—never both.

One more glance at the past to see what God has done for man, that we may work in the same manner, for the same end, and then we are ready for the work. We find he has laid the foundation, and given us the building material. He has also sent his Spirit to aid us, and his angels to guard us. He has also given us a "sure word of prophecy," to which, if we take heed, it will be like a "light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in (our) hearts." Now, for the work. Let the foundation be laid so deeply in every man's heart, that nothing can undermine it. Then, let the Holy Spirit fill the heart (not the head) with the truth, and obedience to God's requirements will result. Then the man is a child of God, and if a child, then an heir—a joint heir with Jesus Christ to eternal life. When this inheritance is received, Death will be banished, and the reform in man will be complete. But the work of reformation is not completed.

The earth and all things earthy, including unregenerate man, is imperfect, and shall these be the abode and society of immortal beings? "No man putteth a piece of new garment upon an old." "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles." No! God will complete the work he has begun. "For behold I create new heavens and a new earth." Then will be a renovated earth and pure and holy inhabitants. "That will be glorious indeed," says our friend. "That is more than we reformers ever looked for."

Yes, short sighted mortal! You talked of large hearts, but your own were not large enough to grasp God's eternal purpose. You talked of elevating men, when you yourselves looked no higher than this perishing earth. You poured forth enchanting words, and with metaphorical flourishes controlled the ear of man, but never the heart. You coined words that expressed nothing; you put forth fantastical ideas that could never be real. Cease your speechifying, and writing, and learn now this lesson—human effort avails nothing alone. "Our sufficiency is of God."

Homeward Bound!

Homeward bound! how the words thrill the heart of the weary mariner on life's tempestuous voyage. Long he may have wandered till the frosts of age have whitened the locks upon his brow; he has seen all the hopes of his life, one by one, perish and fade; those he has loved with that fond and enduring affection which the true heart feels, have passed away, and he has seen them laid in the cold and silent resting place of the dead. Spring's fair flowers have bloomed over their graves; summer's soft winds sighed round them, and winter's cold mantle covered them; still they sleep, silent and unconscious, and he is alone. Life's work seems almost done, and he seems, like one of old, to be waiting for the consolation of Israel. How these words thrill his heart. The wan cheek grows bright with the flush of expectation, and the dim eye glistens as he says, "We are almost there." Perhaps the pilgrim may have seen less years, and with the crown of early manhood still resting on his brow, he is fighting the stern battle of life, striving to overcome the "world, the flesh and the devil," and to preach, by action and words, the gospel of Jesus. As the words, "we are homeward bound," come to his ear, 'mid the confusion and strife, he pauses a moment, thanks God, and takes courage.

In the season of youth, when just beginning to taste the gilded joys of earth, we find them but empty dreams; and when the heart, faint and weary with its first disappointments and conflicts, longs for sympathy and rest, we bow to Jesus, and give our hearts to him, and rejoicing in his love, the heart longs to see him. Just beginning to feel the stern realities of life must be baffled with, we but begin to know that we are and must be pilgrims and strangers here; then the words,—"we're homeward bound," bring a thrill of joy to the heart, and awake a song of praise to Him who alone guides the affairs of this ruined earth.

Thank God! we are almost there; soon the storm-worn bark shall reach the haven. Long has this old earth groaned under the curse. Soon shall it be removed; soon shall life's trial be done, and we be at rest. Soon, very soon, shall we, if faithful, meet with the loved of earth; the mother shall meet with the child she loved, to part no more; the husband, who has laid the wife of his youth in the dark valley, shall meet her then in immortal beauty, to part no more forever. Those we fondly love here with the heart's best affections, but are separated from by stern circumstances, we shall meet then to dwell forever in the presence of the Lamb, around the throne of Him who hath said, "behold I make all things new."

The old ship of time is tossed and worn with the storm; her sails are rent, anp her timbers creaking with age, swept by the rude blasts; but "our Father's at the helm," and, thank God, it will soon outride the storm, and the cry, "We're homeward bound!" will be changed to "home at last, home, at last!" Thank God for the prospect! MARY E. SWEETLAND.

The Soul.—No. 17.

We think we have now given all the uses of nephesh and psukee; the Hebrew and Greek words rendered soul in the Old and New Testaments, but have not yet found anything about an immortal soul.

There is one more text that needs a passing notice,—Matt. 10: 28. If we accept the popular definition of soul, this Scripture would appear quite strong; but when we let the Bible explain itself and be in harmony with its own teachings, common sense, facts and philosophy; we think this passage is quite plain. The passage reads,—"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." The same caution is given in Luke 12: 45, in the following language:—"And I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear; fear him, which after he has killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him."

The word rendered hell in this passage is gehenna. This word originally represented "the valley of Hinnom," a place near Jerusalem, where sacrifices were offered by the Jews. It became a filthy place, and fires were kept burning to destroy or consume the filth there deposited. Worms assisted in devouring the carcasses left there for consumption. Nothing was thrown among this mass of corruption which they wished to preserve; and when the Savior would illustrate the final, future punishment of the wicked, he refers to this gehenna or the valley of Hinnom. Nothing could show more clearly that the wicked were not to be preserved alive eternally; for whatever was cast alive into the fire of gehenna, soon had its life destroyed. And to make the case as strong as possible and put their entire destruction beyond all doubt, he says, the fire shall not be quenched. An unquenchable fire always consumes the burning object. If the fire could be quenched, a part of the burning body might be saved from the "devouring fire;" but if *un*quenchable, it must be burnt up. All beings cast into an unquenchable fire, must lose their lives and have their bodies destroyed.

In Matt. 10: 28, we learn that we should "fear him which is able to DESTROY both soul and body in hell." Does any one suppose that the bodies of wicked men would be preserved by being cast into a fire that could not be extinguished? Certainly not. But the soul is destroyed in the case as truly as the body. It reads, "destroy both." This can not mean destroy the one, and preserve the other from the effects of the fire. Fire either purifies or consumes. It is employed in purifying gold and silver, and for consuming thorns, briars, stubble and tares. The wicked are compared with the last four objects mentioned, but never with any thing that would not be burnt up if cast into fire.

The inference from the passage under consideration is that, if we do not fear God, we shall live in such a way, that he will be under the necessity of destroying "both soul and body," as truly and literally as the life and body of animals and men were destroyed when cast into the fire in the valley of Hinnom.

The word rendered soul in this text is rendered life forty times out of the one hundred and five that occur in the New Testament. We know of no reason why it may not be translated life in this passage as well as in any other. In one translation, the "Emphatic Diaglott," I notice it is rendered life. This makes the passage harmonize with the whole Bible. Is it safe to put a construction upon this text which will be in opposition to all the rest of the Scriptures? This is the only passage we can find which seems to teach that there is any thing about man that cannot be killed by his fellow; but the question arises, what does the word psukee in Matt. 10: 28 represent? We think it does not mean this present soul or life, for the reason that the destruction threatened is not in this life, but in the world to come. Man can, and does take this life, according to many records in the Bible. Is there any other life?—"This is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life." 1 John 2: 25. Can man take that, or kill it? Nay, verily. "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, (or take this life) and after that have no more that they can do." It is certain, then, that man can not take from us our future life, now "hid with Christ in God." The christian has the promise of eternal life; and we have great reason for praising God, that those who martyred his saints, and cut them off from the land of the living in this world, could by no means reach their future life, which they are to receive at "the resurrection of life," "at the last day."

If we should attempt to put the popular construction on Matt. 10: 28, making soul mean the real man, it will be seen from examination, that it overthrows the position assumed, and makes the Bible contradict itself. Let us suppose that soul in this passage represents the real man,—the man David if you please; and in order to make the point plain, we will put the word David in the place of soul, promising that David and soul are synonymous. Then it will read, "fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill" David, "but rather fear him which is able to destroy both" David and his "body in hell." This makes a full destruction of the whole of David. No part escapes from the destruction.

But we return to the first clause of the verse. Admitting that soul and David are identical, permit Peter to say a word about this matter. "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried... David is not ascended into the heavens." Acts 2: 29, 34. "For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep and was laid unto his fathers and saw corruption." Acts. 13: 36. If soul represents the real man David, then it is plain, according to the Bible, that "he is both dead and buried," and "is not ascended into the heavens." We think it plain, that the word soul in Matt. 10: 28, does not represent the man, but the future life, over which man has no power. He may cut us off from this present existence, but can not from the life to come, which is promised through Christ, as a gift, to be received when He "who is our life shall appear."

We find the words rendered die, death, dead, &c., occur twenty-five hundred and eighty-two times in the Bible, not one of which intimates that the being is alive between death and the resurrection, unless it be the one under consideration. Is it fair to interpret this one so as to make it contradict twenty-five hundred and eighty-one others? We leave the reader to judge.

In our next, we purpose to complete our series of articles on the soul.

Tracts and Books.

We have just received a new and large assortment of excellent tracts from Bro. Hastings, which should, like carrier doves, be flying to all parts of the land. They contain important truths adapted to the times in which we live. Every church should form a tract society for the distribution of these little messengers, which are so well adapted to the wants of the people. We are sorry we have not been able to fill orders sooner, but are thankful for the ability to do it now. It is a very favorable time to scatter the light and truth, and the opportunity should not be lost. The last days have fully come, and soon it will be too late to warn our fellow beings of their danger.

How we wish all our readers would exchange their tea, coffee, and tobacco money, for these words of warning, and scatter them among their neighbors. Such a sacrifice would be a great blessing to those who abandon the use of these narcotics, besides the good that might result from the tracts distributed in the neighborhood. Are there not many that will take hold of this good work?

If you drink but four cups a day, reckoning them at the low price of one cent a cup, including milk and sugar, it would amount to $14,60 per year, which would pay for about fourteen thousand pages of tracts. Dear Brn. and Srs., do not let these little treasures of truth lie on our shelves, when so many are anxious to read them, and when, by a little self denial, you can scatter them like leaves of the forest—as blessings to your fellow beings—and at the same time improve your own health and happiness, as all can testify who have made the experiment.

For the Crisis.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 11.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I heard a minister at one time publicly thank God that he had been converted out of the 7th chapter of Rom. into the 8th! We will soon pass in there, but first let me cite your attention to a few items more in the former. In the 5th verse, the apostle says that when we were in the flesh, the motions of sin which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death." Those "motions" he goes on most accurately to describe. Read the 13th verse, and observe its correspondence with the 5th, also the 23d verse—"When we were in the flesh." Turn to the 8th chapt., verse 8,—"So then they that are in the flesh, cannot please God." After assuming that freedom comes through Jesus Christ—freedom from the law of sin or death, respecting which he has been treating in the former chapter; and that now he is brought under the law of the Spirit of life, and that he is enabled by that law to do what by the former law he could not do, he contrasts the condition of those who are under the two laws in a condensed manner, and affirms that "to be carnally-minded is death, but to be spiritually-minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of Christ dwell in you."

How clearly is it here taught that he has been describing in the former chapter the wretched condition of one who was in the flesh—minding the things of the flesh—subject to the law that was in his members, therefore not pleasing God; and in the 8th, the blessed condition of one who through Christ had been delivered from the law of sin and death, "that being dead wherein they were held," and that they were now enabled to walk after the Spirit, and to mind the things of the Spirit; and when they would do good, they did it, and when they would not do evil, they did it not. No longer a "wretched man," but possessing the spirit of adoption, he declares that nothing shall separate him from the love of God; neither tribulation, nor distress, or persecution, or famine, nakedness, peril, nor sword, but declares that in all these he is more than conqueror through Him that had loved him. O yes! Paul is now a free man! No longer a slave, but a conqueror—yea, "more than conqueror!" I have devoted considerable time to a consideration of this chapter, as it is the strong-hold of those who contend that a man cannot live sinless here, and compared it with the 8th in order to test its soundness.

The other strong proof text, as they suppose, has been commented on in a former letter, 2nd. Those who believe that an individual may live free from condemnation, but still have a constant warfare with the carnal mind, from which they are not delivered until death, quote this text frequently in support of this belief:—"For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would." This, they argue, teaches that these two conflicting principles exist in the heart of the truly regenerate, but while they "walk after the Spirit," obey its influence, they will not "fulfil the lusts of the flesh" so as to be thereby brought into captivity.

In opposition to this, it is argued that the apostle refers to the condition of those who had abandoned the gospel, and were striving to be justified by the works of the law, and were unable to overcome, because destitute of the power of the Spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus. This is thought to be sustained by the language; "so that ye cannot do the things that he would," corresponding with the ineffectual strivings against the flesh, brought to view by the apostle in the 7th of Rom. He tells them to "walk in the Spirit," as affording the only means of deliverance, and in the 13th verse assures them that if they are led by the Spirit, they are under the law.

By reference to the first part of the chapter, it is evident that he is addressing those who are disposed to resort to the law, and submit to the rite of circumcision. Many are sustained in this belief by their own experience. They know that in themselves there exist divers lusts of the flesh, against which they maintain continual strife, and by which they are often entangled, and brought into bondage, and, without carefully examining the word of God, in order to ascertain if that offers to them any deliverance, or minding the teachings of the Spirit, which again and again urge upon them the need of a deeper work of grace; they settle down into the belief that they will always have the warfare until the hour of death, and then they will be delivered and become victorious.

We will next examine the faith of those who maintain that the Bible offers to the believer entire deliverance from the guilt, power, and corruption of sin.

Yours for the truth, M. D. W.

Report of the East Central Maine Advent Conference.

Met in conference Saturday morning, Jan. 22d, with Eld. S. K. Partridge in the chair, and in the absence of the Secretary made choice of Thomas Smith as Scribe pro tem.

The subject and propriety of church organization was discussed by Brn. Harding, Dudley and Kennedy, and was approved by the most present. Proceeded to hear reports from the several churches represented within the bounds of this conference. Bro. Kennedy reported from the small church in Somerville. In this place they have church order, with prayer and conference meetings, and occasional preaching of the word. Bro. J. Partridge, from Whitefield, said that until within one year he had been opposed to organization, but now fully saw its propriety and importance. Small number of members, and no constant meeting.

Bro. M. Hemmingway, from South Hope, said they had no regular organization, but they were united and striving to live for the Lord, and wait for his Son from heaven. Constant meetings on the Sabbath, with occasional preaching and prayer meetings twice in the week. Prospects encouraging.

Bro. J. Dudley of Augusta said, in his field of labor, Crosses Hill and South Togus, &c., the people manifested much interest in hearing the word, and appeared anxious to learn what was THE TRUTH.

Eld. S. K. Partridge, of North Whitefield, said the small church in that place was in gospel order. Quite an interest was manifest in his vicinity. Some converted to God, and men of mind were investigating the subjects of the state of the dead and end of the wicked, as an important Scriptural question; some deciding in favor of the unconscious state and the destruction of the wicked. He also mentioned the death of two worthy sisters of the church of South Hope—Srs. Walker and Rowley, who fell on sleep in hope of a part in the first resurrection.

Voted to adjourn to the next conference, to be holden on the first Thursday of June, place to be hereafter designated.

Signed, S. K. PARTRIDGE, Chairman.

Cause in the West.

Left home Nov. 22d for Shabbona Grove, to attend my Quarterly Meeting. Arrived there in time to meet my appointment the 25th, 7 P. M. Continued meetings till one week from the next Monday, and the result was good—an increasing interest from the commencement. Many were waked up, and some converted to the truth. Our dear Bro. Spencer, who has been laboring with the church there as their pastor, for the last four years, has withdrawn from his charge on account of his health. He is quite ill, amd must give up preaching for the present. I hope the Lord will see fit to restore him soon to health. The field is large and the laborers are few. How soon the day will close, the gospel trump will cease to sound, and man's destiny be told! What a time we are living in! The last sand will soon drop from the glass, and the judgment is here!

"Fly, fly, on wings of morning,
Ye who the truth can tell,
And sound the awful warning,
To rescue souls from hell!"

Left Shabbona Grove for home on Monday, Dec. 6th. Had a very cold and stormy time; also the ague and fever on the way. Was very sick. Friday, 10th, left for my appointment in Iowa. Arrived at Wilton Saturday. Stayed there till Tuesday. Had a stirring time; good number turned out, and God blessed his word. Some embraced the love of the truth. The last evening after preaching, an elderly man, who had been a professed infidel, a merchant in the place, came up to me and gave me one dollar, and said, "I want you to come again; there is some sense in such preaching." I left there on Tuesday 14th, to meet my appointment in this place.

Letter from H. L. Hastings.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—By God's grace, I yet live and continue in the gospel work. As to my health, it is not established yet, my right lung still giving me some uneasiness, and preventing my laboring as extensively as I would like to do. Still I live in hope of perfect health, in the better land, if not here. As to work, I have to report progress. I have worked up something like a ton of paper into books, tracts, &c., and am now ready to fill orders for them. I regret that my delay has been so long, and am sorry that so many have been kept waiting, but hope their love and patience will endure the trial. I will notice a few works that I have on hand.

First, however, let me premise. I have no copies of the Unity of Man, nor but few of Dobney on Future Punishment. I do not expect to have any more, as the plates of the first part of Dobney, and the whole of the Unity of Man, have very unfortunately been melted up and destroyed—not annihilated, but destroyed. So brethren will have the kindness not to order Unity of Man any more of me,—and if they want Dobney complete, they must get it soon.

Now for what I have on hand.

1. Voice of the Church—4th thousand. Most of the readers of the Crisis know its value—those who don't, should read it. Price $1.

2. The Great Controversy, by H. L. H., second edition, on thin paper, neatly bound. Price 50 cents.

3. Pauline Theology—tenth thousand. This pamphlet speaks for itself, and no one has answered it to my knowledge. It has been out of print some months, but can now be furnished. 15 cents single; $10 per one hundred.

4. The Old Paths. Part I. Price 18 cents.

5. All my old standard Tracts, as on the list.

6. Man in Death, by Bishop Law, a selection of references taken from his appendix on the state of the dead. One of the strongest collections ever presented. Four pages. Price 1 cent single, 50 cents per 100.

7. Scripture Searchers. The old ones revised and enlarged, and three new ones added on the Judgment. The Resurrection, and Plain Truths. Price in setts, 3 cents single, $1 50 per 100.

8. Three New Olive Leaves: "Wondrous Love," "Abundant Grace," and "Go in Peace," making six numbers in all. Price of the sett, 5 cents single, $3.00 per 100.

9. Important Questions. 1. "Are you a Christian?" 2. "Why not now?" and "Are you pardoned?" 3 Nos., 4 pages each. Price per sett, 3 cts. single, $1.50 per 100.

10. Tracts on Prophecy—a neatly bound volume, containing Church not in Darkness, Three Worlds, Last Days, Plain Truths, Warning, New Heavens and Earth, Ancient Landmarks, Olive Leaves, Day of Judgment, Outline of the Coast, The Night Cometh, Important Questions, and Scripture Searchers, 4, 5 and 6. Making in all a volume of 224 closely printed pages. Sent by mail on receipt of 60 cts.

11. Tracts on Immortality, uniform with Tracts on Prophecy, containing Pauline Theology, Old Paths, State of the Dead, by Milton, Destiny of the Wicked, Man in Death, by Bishop Law, Forty Questions on Immortality, Scripture Searchers—220 pages. Price, sent by mail, post paid, 60 cents. Both volumes mailed to any address for $1.00. These two volumes comprise nearly all of my smaller publications. I have frequently been solicited to furnish these tracts in form suitable for preservation, and I have much pleasure in presenting these little volumes to such as wish to preserve their tracts in a compact and permanent form.

12. My Pilgrim Harp, containing seventeen tunes, fifteen of which are either original, or newly arranged; also more than forty hymns, nearly thirty of which are original, and twenty-five of which can be found in no other book. Price 10 cts. single, $6 per 100.

13. "Fables of Infidelity and Facts of Faith," by R. Patterson. The best work I know of for the popular reader to meet the many forms of infidelity prevalent throughout the land. This book will be a 12 mo. volume of 320 pages—a little larger than Dobney—neatly bound. It contains a large amount of matter, as it is printed in fine type on large pages. I shall send it by mail, post paid, for 75 cents, or will send it by express, at the expense of the buyer, for $6 per dozen.

☞ Any person who buys and reads this book, and does n't get 75 cents' worth out of it, may give the book to some infidel, and send me word, and I will refund him the cost of the volume.

Well, brethren, the books are at your service. They may be ordered from the Crisis office, or from me at Rochester, N. Y. The poor can have them free, and those who think them too dear, can have them at their own price. So let all be accommodated and suited. One thing more. Some who owe for books, cannot pay at present, if ever. If others will try and act as prompt as possible, we will try and keep the car moving. Good bye, dear brethren. Pray for me. Bro. D. T. Taylor writes me that he is "pretty well for a sick man," and adds, "Ah! those prayers have done good. Oh, praise the Lord!" I remember you before the throne. Let me be remembered there by you.

Your brother, H. L. Hastings.

Letter from E. J. Marden.

Bro Grant:—As I read the last paper in the year, a sensation came over me such as I seldom have, but it stirred me to understand that a great conflict had commenced; and it stirred me to prayer, not only for those who stand in the front of the battle, but for all who know and love the truth, that they may be strengthened to do all the work assigned them by our great Leader, who is preparing not a small number, by severe discipline, to constitute "His army." How grand and awful is the time in which we live! All who know it must feel the importance of walking uprightly, girding on the whole armor, quitting themselves like men. Such mean what they say when they profess their attachment to the Bible,—have counted the cost—expect all sorts of treatment—are not ignorant of Satan's devices, who will not fail to use his weakest as well as his mightiest weapons.

"The glow in the East," that indicates the morning, captivates every faculty of the mind, and governs the entire being, while faith takes hold of the promise, "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." For the last six months, I have felt the importance, yea, the necessity of believing God, not only in some of his teachings, but in all he may be pleased to communicate. "The Scriptures saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness." At first, we find Abram believing and going out, at God's command, not knowing whither he went. How cheering it must have been to him to hear the voice of the Lord. At one time the work of the Lord came to him in a vision, saying, "Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward." At another time he appeared unto him and said, "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." Abram knew the Lord, and his manner of communicating to him, which I have supposed was peculiar to that dispensation. Afterward the Lord spoke unto his people by Moses and other prophets. Faith and obedience were required. The Apostle says, "In these last days, He hath spoken unto us by his Son."

By faith in Christ Jesus, we become the children of God; and they that be of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham. But Jesus has gone into Heaven to appear in the presence of God for us. He told his disciples "it was necessary he should go away, that the Comforter might come, who should reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.—Howbeit . . He will guide you into all truth . . . and He will show you things to come." Again Jesus speaks of the Comforter as the Spirit of truth, "whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you and shall be in you." It is just as important to believe God in his present manner of speaking, as it was for Noah, for Abraham, for Moses and the people. The effect of believing is the same. The effect of unbelief the same. "He that believeth on the Son, hath life; he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." Abraham "staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness. Now it was not written for his sake alone that it was imputed to him, but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed if we believe on Him who raised up Jesus, our Lord, from the dead."

How progressive the work of faith! How wondrous the plan of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ, for by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses. Here the great question is answered, How shall man be just with God? Believe God. "And the just shall walk by his faith." Believe God every day, and be just every day. "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit." To walk implies a going forward. It won't do to settle down on some past good received, and become blind to truths which some dear child of God who is further advanced in the path of the just, is required to give to the church as meat in due season. Jesus says, "He that is of God, heareth God's words." He who knoweth the Spirit, having it dwelling in him, witnesseth with the same Spirit in others. This work will be the better understood as we approach the perfect day.

No. Palermo, Me.

From Sr. M. H. Austin.

My Dear Brn. and Srs.:—As I left the East quite unexpectedly, I did not have the privilege of bidding many of you farewell; it grieved me much, and my prayer to-day is, that we all may be enabled to fight the good fight of faith, keep ourselves unspotted from the world, that at last we may be gathered with his chosen ones, where no farewell tear is shed. And now what word of exhortation or encouragement can I give you? None than be faithful, gird up the loins of your mind, "watch and be sober," hope to the end, for "behold the Judge standeth at the door."

My dear sisters, prize the precious privileges you now enjoy from time to time, speak often one to another, it will cheer and encourage the weak and fainting one. You have counted the cost, O, do not shrink at the cross; His strong arm will surely shield you, and His grace bring you off more than conquerors at last. For myself I would again say, I thank God for the hope of a literal resurrection, and to-day can say,

"I hail thy bright beams, O morn of Zion's glory!"

O let us cling to this blessed hope, continually striving to enter in at the strait gate. I feel myself that,

"Soon this toilsome strife will end,
Of sublunary care,
And life's dull vanities no more
This anxious breast ensnare.

Courage, my soul, on God rely,
Deliverance soon will come;
It is a strait and narrow way,
To bring believers home."

Dear brethren and sisters, though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in spirit. Once again I am called to mourn. Within a few days the sad news of my dear mother's death has reached me; but I mourn not without hope, for those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. It is written by the finger of the Son of God, I will raise them up at the last day. No voice will be heard by the dead, no sound penetrate their silent mansion, until the trump of God shall arouse them from their quiet slumbers. Thanks, thanks be to God, the grave will not always confine them. Jesus has slept in the tomb, and has revealed to us the certainty of the resurrection. So farewell, my mother, thy Savior watches thy precious dust; thou art safe indeed!

"My mother! Oh, thy name is yet
A treasured thought, and long will be,
E'en till with parting life shall set
The pole-star of my memory!
For thou to me hast been while here,
A guide to warn, a light to guide,
To thy unceasing love I owe
More than to all the world beside.
Thy kindness now seems doubly dear,
Since thou art gone, and gone forever!
How bright affection's hues appear,
Which nought can dim, though death may sever."

Bro. Grant, truly our hope is a blessed hope. Do not shun to declare the whole counsel of God, whether men will hear or forbear. I thought when I heard of the revival in Poultney, Vt., that the truth was gaining ground. Surely, "The fiery pillar moves; we'll go on, we'll go on."

M. H. Austin.

From P. S. W. Deyo.

Bro. Grant:—About four weeks since, I commenced a series of meetings six miles from here, in Little York. The result is, nine have united with the Strawberry Point Church. And those that are acquainted with the state of things at this place, will be cheered to know that the little church that was organized after the Conference, now numbers twenty, and more will soon join, to hold up the gospel banner of liberty, and to maintain primitive faith and christianity.

My confidence in God is strengthened, and I love him more and more. Let us dwell in love, endure hardness as good soldiers, and win the crown laid up for all those that love his appearing.

A New Discussion.

Bro. Grant:—Permit me to state to your readers that I have made arrangements for a discussion in the Christian Freeman, with the Editor, Rev. Sylvanus Cobb. His paper is known as the prominent Universalist organ of this city. Mr. C. is now replying to Dr. N. Adams' argument in support of the so-called orthodox view. My argument will be given in consecutive numbers of the paper, mostly if not wholly in the month of May. I have prepared the following outline:—

1. The prominent occasions of Universalist belief.
2. Are there radically bad men?
3. Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of man as a race, or of the good,—or those who shall become good,—as a class?
4. The historical argument, mainly as comment on the expression, "Life and immortality brought to light."
5. The rational argument; or, is the view I offer consistent with a sound philosophy and with the sentiments of humanity?

Mr. Cobb will reply in successive numbers, beginning soon after myself, and allowing me a rejoinder after he is done. The whole discussion will occupy about three months.

Mr. C. allows me to supply those who may wish to aid me. Fifty cents will be the probable expense for the period. Any who wish the paper for that time, may send this amount to me, care of J. P. Jewett & Co., or to your office, before May 1st.

I may add that the discussion will cost me considerable time and labor, with incidental expense. Yours truly,

C. F. Hudson.

For the Crisis.

Is all Punishment Reformatory?

Bro. Grant:—I have been much interested reading Bro. Burnham's article on "Eternal Torment." He says in proposition 24,—"All punishment is for the reformation of the offender and the good of others." Will he be so good as to show how the resurrection and destruction of the wicked can do anybody any good? Or is it in keeping with the character of God, to bring "the poor miserable creatures" to life just for the sake of killing them again? A Searcher for Truth.

Query.

Will some brother explain through the Crisis, Heb. 6: 15;—"And so, after he (Abraham) had patiently endured, he obtained the promise?" Mary.

Editorial Notice.

Correction.—In the Crisis of Jan. 19th, 1859, near the end of the 14th article on the soul, in Class IV, the comma between she and will should be omitted. The two words are associated together, representing one, instead of two renderings of nephesh.

In the 13th article on "the soul," Jan. 12th, at the beginning of No. 37, for Gen. 23: 9, substitute Gen. 23: 8. In the same No. Ezk. 18: 22 and Ezk. 18: 28, should read Ezk. 23: 22 and Ezk. 23: 28.

Keeping the Teeth Clean.—Microscopical examinations have been made of the matter deposited on the teeth and gums of more than forty individuals, selected from all classes of society, in every variety of bodily condition, and in nearly every case animal and vegetable parasites in great numbers have been discovered. Of the animal parasites there were three or four species, and of the vegetable, one or two. In fact, the only persons whose mouths were found to be completely free from them, cleansed their teeth four times daily, using soap once. One or two of the individuals also passed a thread between the teeth to cleanse them more effectually. In all cases the number of parasites was greater in proportion to the neglect of cleanliness. The effect of the application of various agents was also noticed. Tobacco juice and smoking did not injure their vitality in the least. The same was true of the chlorine tooth wash, of pulverized bark, of soda, ammonia, and various other popular detergents. The application of soap, however, appeared to destroy them instantly. We may hence infer that this is the best and most proper specific for cleansing the teeth.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in East Douglas, Mass., Jan. 6th, of congestion of the lungs, occasioned by a painful surgical operation in taking a large tumor from the side of the neck, Bro. E. R. Converse, in the 28th year of his age.

In his last sickness he suffered intensely, but in the midst of it all he could confidingly trust in the great Redeemer, and find peace and consolation. He has left a loved companion, with a little one to miss the sweet smiles and caresses of a most tender father; and the counsel of an affectionate husband; with brothers and sisters who deeply feel the loss they have sustained; but while their hearts are bleeding, and they expect never to have the deep wound caused by the cruel shaft of death fully healed until God shall be the plague of death, and destroy the grave; yet they have consolation in their deepest affliction, with the strongest assurance, drawn from a life in strict conformity with the word of God; a heavenly-mindedness manifested in all his daily walk and conversation; as well as a joyous, buoyant hope, and triumphant, victorious faith in the hour of death; that he sleeps in the arms of the great Restorer; and when the glad morning of restitution shall break in beams of brightness o'er the darkness of the grave, Elthan will awake from the tomb to catch with expectant, joyous gaze, the first ray of its dawning glory, and in immortality live to die no more.

A large concourse of sympathizing friends, by the moistened eye and falling tear, as they gathered to the house of mourning, gave evidence how deeply he was beloved, and how much they felt the stroke of the monster's power. To many who had not the privilege of seeing how calmly, and with what steady faith and joyful hope he met the decisive hour, the sweet heavenly smile that sat, even in death, on his manly features, told with thrilling effect on their hearts, with what calm resignation and holy triumph the christian can meet the stern mandate of death, and bid him do his worst; knowing that ere long a more mighty conqueror will come, and the dreadful reign of the destroyer will end.

May God sanctify this deep affliction to the friends that mourn, and may they be prepared to meet the loved one in the pilgrim's everlasting home.

The writer attempted to speak words of exhortation, consolation and warning, to a densely crowded house, who listened with deep attention, from Prov. 14: 22.

S. W. Bishop.

Letter from E. J. Marden.

Bro Grant:—As I read the last paper in the year, a sensation came over me such as I seldom have, but it stirred me to understand that a great conflict had commenced; and it stirred me to prayer, not only for those who stand in the front of the battle, but for all who know and love the truth, that they may be strengthened to do all the work assigned them by our great Leader, who is preparing not a small number, by severe discipline, to constitute "His army." How grand and awful is the time in which we live! All who know it must feel the importance of walking uprightly, girding on the whole armor, quitting themselves like men. Such mean what they say when they profess their attachment to the Bible,—have counted the cost—expect all sorts of treatment—are not ignorant of Satan's devices, who will not fail to use his weakest as well as his mightiest weapons.

"The glow in the East," that indicates the morning, captivates every faculty of the mind, and governs the entire being, while faith takes hold of the promise, "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." For the last six months, I have felt the importance, yea, the necessity of believing God, not only in some of his teachings, but in all he may be pleased to communicate. "The Scriptures saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness." At first, we find Abram believing and going out, at God's command, not knowing whither he went. How cheering it must have been to him to hear the voice of the Lord. At one time the work of the Lord came to him in a vision, saying, "Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward." At another time he appeared unto him and said, "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." Abram knew the Lord, and his manner of communicating to him, which I have supposed was peculiar to that dispensation. Afterward the Lord spoke unto his people by Moses and other prophets. Faith and obedience were required. The Apostle says, "In these last days, He hath spoken unto us by his Son."

By faith in Christ Jesus, we become the children of God; and they that be of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham. But Jesus has gone into Heaven to appear in the presence of God for us. He told his disciples "it was necessary he should go away, that the Comforter might come, who should reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.—Howbeit . . . He will guide you into all truth . . . and He will show you things to come." Again Jesus speaks of the Comforter as the Spirit of truth, "whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you and shall be in you." It is just as important to believe God in his present manner of speaking, as it was for Noah, for Abraham, for Moses and the people. The effect of believing is the same. The effect of unbelief the same. "He that believeth on the Son, hath life; he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." Abraham "staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness. Now it was not written for his sake alone that it was imputed to him, but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed if we believe on Him who raised up Jesus, our Lord, from the dead."

How progressive the work of faith! How wondrous the plan of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ, for by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses. Here the great question is answered, How shall man be just with God? Believe God. "And the just shall walk by his faith." Believe God every day, and be just every day. "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit." To walk implies a going forward. It won't do to settle down on some past good received, and become blind to truths which some dear child of God who is further advanced in the path of the just, is required to give to the church as meat in due season. Jesus says, "He that is of God, heareth God's words." He who knoweth the Spirit, having it dwelling in him, witnesseth with the same Spirit in others. This work will be the better understood as we approach the perfect day.

No. Palermo, Me.

From Sr. M. H. Austin.

My Dear Brn. and Srs.:—As I left the East quite unexpectedly, I did not have the privilege of bidding many of you farewell; it grieved me much, and my prayer to-day is, that we all may be enabled to fight the good fight of faith, keep ourselves unspotted from the world, that at last we may be gathered with his chosen ones, where no farewell tear is shed. And now what word of exhortation or encouragement can I give you? None than be faithful, gird up the loins of your mind, "watch and be sober," hope to the end, for "behold the Judge standeth at the door."

My dear sisters, prize the precious privileges you now enjoy from time to time, speak often one to another, it will cheer and encourage the weak and fainting one. You have counted the cost, O, do not shrink at the cross; His strong arm will surely shield you, and His grace bring you off more than conquerors at last. For myself I would again say, I thank God for the hope of a literal resurrection, and to-day can say,

"I hail thy bright beams, O morn of Zion's glory!"

O let us cling to this blessed hope, continually striving to enter in at the strait gate. I feel myself that,

"Soon this toilsome strife will end,
Of sublunary care,
And life's dull vanities no more
This anxious breast ensnare.

Courage, my soul, on God rely,
Deliverance soon will come;
It is a strait and narrow way,
To bring believers home."

Dear brethren and sisters, though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in spirit. Once again I am called to mourn. Within a few days the sad news of my dear mother's death has reached me; but I mourn not without hope, for those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. It is written by the finger of the Son of God, I will raise them up at the last day. No voice will be heard by the dead, no sound penetrate their silent mansion, until the trump of God shall arouse them from their quiet slumbers. Thanks, thanks be to God, the grave will not always confine them. Jesus has slept in the tomb, and has revealed to us the certainty of the resurrection. So farewell, my mother, thy Savior watches thy precious dust; thou art safe indeed!

"My mother! Oh, thy name is yet
A treasured thought, and long will be,
E'en till with parting life shall set
The pole-star of my memory!
For thou to me hast been while here,
A guide to warn, a light to guide,
To thy unceasing love I owe
More than to all the world beside.
Thy kindness now seems doubly dear,
Since thou art gone, and gone forever!
How bright affection's hues appear,
Which nought can dim, though death may sever."

Bro. Grant, truly our hope is a blessed hope. Do not shun to declare the whole counsel of God, whether men will hear or forbear. I thought when I heard of the revival in Poultney, Vt., that the truth was gaining ground. Surely, "The fiery pillar moves; we'll go on, we'll go on."

M. H. Austin.

Weyauwego, Wis.

From P. S. W. Deyo.

Bro. Grant:—About four weeks since, I commenced a series of meetings six miles from here, in Little York. The result is, nine have united with the Strawberry Point Church. And those that are acquainted with the state of things at this place, will be cheered to know that the little church that was organized after the Conference, now numbers twenty, and more will soon join, to hold up the gospel banner of liberty, and to maintain primitive faith and christianity.

My confidence in God is strengthened, and I love him more and more. Let us dwell in love, endure hardness as good soldiers, and win the crown laid up for all those that love his appearing.

For the Crisis.

A New Discussion.

Bro. Grant:—Permit me to state to your readers that I have made arrangements for a discussion in the Christian Freeman, with the Editor, Rev. Sylvanus Cobb. His paper is known as the prominent Universalist organ of this city. Mr. C. is now replying to Dr. N. Adams' argument in support of the so-called orthodox view. My argument will be given in consecutive numbers of the paper, mostly if not wholly in the month of May. I have prepared the following outline:—

1. The prominent occasions of Universalist belief.

2. Are there radically bad men?

3. Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of man as a race, or of the good,—or those who shall become good,—as a class?

4. The historical argument, mainly as comment on the expression, "Life and immortality brought to light."

5. The rational argument; or, is the view I offer consistent with a sound philosophy and with the sentiments of humanity?

Mr. Cobb will reply in successive numbers, beginning soon after myself, and allowing me a rejoinder after he is done. The whole discussion will occupy about three months.

Mr. C. allows me to supply those who may wish to aid me. Fifty cents will be the probable expense for the period. Any who wish the paper for that time, may send this amount to me, care of J. P. Jewett & Co., or to your office, before May 1st.

I may add that the discussion will cost me considerable time and labor, with incidental expense. Yours truly,

C. F. Hudson.

For the Crisis.

Is all Punishment Reformatory?

Bro. Grant:—I have been much interested reading Bro. Burnham's article on "Eternal Torment." He says in proposition 24,—"All punishment is for the reformation of the offender and the good of others." Will he be so good as to show how the resurrection and destruction of the wicked can do anybody any good? Or is it in keeping with the character of God, to bring "the poor miserable creatures" to life just for the sake of killing them again? A Searcher for Truth.

Kingsbury, Ind., Jan. 25th.

For the Crisis.

Query.

Will some brother explain through the Crisis, Heb. 6: 15;—"And so, after he (Abraham) had patiently endured, he obtained the promise?" Mary.

Collinsville, Conn.

Editorial Notice.

Correction.—In the Crisis of Jan. 19th, 1859, near the end of the 14th article on the soul, in Class IV, the comma between she and will should be omitted. The two words are associated together, representing one, instead of two renderings of nephesh.

In the 13th article on "the soul," Jan. 12th, at the beginning of No. 37, for Gen. 23: 9, substitute Gen. 23: 8. In the same No. Ezk. 18: 22 and Ezk. 18: 28, should read Ezk. 23: 22 and Ezk. 23: 28.

Keeping the Teeth Clean.—Microscopical examinations have been made of the matter deposited on the teeth and gums of more than forty individuals, selected from all classes of society, in every variety of bodily condition, and in nearly every case animal and vegetable parasites in great numbers have been discovered. Of the animal parasites there were three or four species, and of the vegetable, one or two. In fact, the only persons whose mouths were found to be completely free from them, cleansed their teeth four times daily, using soap once. One or two of the individuals also passed a thread between the teeth to cleanse them more effectually. In all cases the number of parasites was greater in proportion to the neglect of cleanliness. The effect of the application of various agents was also noticed. Tobacco juice and smoking did not injure their vitality in the least. The same was true of the chlorine tooth wash, of pulverized bark, of soda, ammonia, and various other popular detergents. The application of soap, however, appeared to destroy them instantly. We may hence infer that this is the best and most proper specific for cleansing the teeth.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in East Douglas, Mass., Jan. 6th, of congestion of the lungs, occasioned by a painful surgical operation in taking a large tumor from the side of the neck, Bro. E. R. Converse, in the 28th year of his age.

In his last sickness he suffered intensely, but in the midst of it all he could confidingly trust in the great Redeemer, and find peace and consolation. He has left a loved companion, with a little one to miss the sweet smiles and caresses of a most tender father; and the counsel of an affectionate husband; with brothers and sisters who deeply feel the loss they have sustained; but while their hearts are bleeding, and they expect never to have the deep wound caused by the cruel shaft of death fully healed until God shall be the plague of death, and destroy the grave; yet they have consolation in their deepest affliction, with the strongest assurance, drawn from a life in strict conformity with the word of God; a heavenly-mindedness manifested in all his daily walk and conversation; as well as a joyous, buoyant hope, and triumphant, victorious faith in the hour of death; that he sleeps in the arms of the great Restorer; and when the glad morning of restitution shall break in beams of brightness o'er the darkness of the grave, Elthan will awake from the tomb to catch with expectant, joyous gaze, the first ray of its dawning glory, and in immortality live to die no more.

A large concourse of sympathizing friends, by the moistened eye and falling tear, as they gathered to the house of mourning, gave evidence how deeply he was beloved, and how much they felt the stroke of the monster's power. To many who had not the privilege of seeing how calmly, and with what steady faith and joyful hope he met the decisive hour, the sweet heavenly smile that sat, even in death, on his manly features, told with thrilling effect on their hearts, with what calm resignation and holy triumph the christian can meet the stern mandate of death, and bid him do his worst; knowing that ere long a more mighty conqueror will come, and the dreadful reign of the destroyer will end.

May God sanctify this deep affliction to the friends that mourn, and may they be prepared to meet the loved one in the pilgrim's everlasting home.

The writer attempted to speak words of exhortation, consolation and warning, to a densely crowded house, who listened with deep attention, from Prov. 14: 22.

S. W. Bishop.

Poetry.

THE PEACE OF GOD.

We ask for Peace, oh Lord!
Thy children ask thy Peace;
Not what the world calls rest,
That toil and care should cease,
That through bright sunny hours
Calm life should fleet away,
And tranquil night should fade
In smiling day;
It is not for such Peace that we would pray.

We ask for Peace, oh Lord!
Yet not to stand secure,
Girt round with iron pride,
Contented to endure—
Crushing the gentle strings
That human hearts should know,
Untouched by others' joys
Or others' woe,
Thou, oh dear Lord, wilt never teach us so.

We ask thy Peace, oh Lord!
Through storm and fear and strife,
To light and guide us on,
Through a long struggling life;
While no success or gain
Shall cheer the desperate fight,
Or nerve what the world calls
Our wasted might;
Yet pressing through the darkness to the light.

It is thine own, oh Lord,
Who toil while others sleep;
Who sow with living care
What other hands shall reap;
They lean on thee entranced
In calm and perfect rest:
Give us that Peace, oh Lord!
Divine and blest,
Thou keepest for those hearts who love Thee best.

For the Crisis.

The Vale of Tears.

"Oh, think what crowds in every land
Are wretched and forlorn;
Through weary life this lesson learn—
That man was made to mourn!"

Upon a survey of the history of man in all ages; the records of oppressive government; of war; of the slave trade and slavery; of idolatry; of persecutions for opinion's sake; of sensualism, licentiousness and debauchery; in short, of the countless miseries resulting from dishonesty, intemperance, gambling, robbery, murder, and the thousand minor shades of guilt and guilty sorrows;—we feel that "the whole hemisphere of contemplation is inexpressibly dark and mysterious." The full record of Man would be like the Prophet's Scroll, a volume whose entries would all be,—"lamentation, mourning and woe!"

Once, a happy, unsorrowing pair ambulated the green groves of Eden, that Paradise of delight in a world of beauty and enjoyment, canopied with heaven's serenest blue, and carpeted with living green, inwrought with nature's rich mosaic of virgin bloom; but "sin entered," and our venerable ancestors were exiled from the "garden of God," and doomed to sighing and sorrow till the winter of death should forever freeze the fountains of grief! And since Adam and Eve purloined the noxious fruit "of that forbidden tree," and mantled in mourning, became outcasts from the Divine presence, and travelers toward the tomb—

"Scarce ever morning wore
To evening, but some heart did break."

The blightings of sin have tempest-swept the world, and it has become "a wilderness of woe." It is no longer a delectable clime, but a vast scorched Sahara; its fountains few, its palms withering, and the great caravans of nations moving through its stifling siroccos, and over its burning sands, to the desolations of the grave. The flickering lights of ancient history are thrown, in their dim reflections, across the lapse of ages, from the crimson surface of "oceans of blood," which have been kept brimming over by the red Amazons of mediæval and modern war.

The silken bonds of love and the tenderest friendships are rudely severed by death. A kind father to-day caresses his playful children; but anon faints in life's pilgrimage, breathes a farewell to "the loved ones at home," and sinks into the dreamless sleep. Somewhere on life's thorny pathway the warm pulses of the true heart of that kindest and best of human friends—the mother—stand still. Some "bow drawn at a venture" in the great "battle of life," sends an arrow to the manly breast of the doated son and trusted brother, and the turf-counterpane covers the parent's hope and the sister's pride. The crimson bloom is bleached by disease from the sister's fair cheek, and succeeded by the paleness of death, and the petals of that stately flower, the admired and loved of the family group, blend with the dust. And, "alas for love!"

"To-day, while hearts with rapture spring,
The youth to beauty's lips may cling;
To-morrow, and that heart of bliss
May throb unconscious of his kiss."

The infant's cradle is to-day oscillated by the hand of love—to-morrow a little coffin encloses the miniature of man. An untimely frost chilled the tiny bud, and the blossom never unfolds. True, a few oases may checker the wildest desert; a single temple may grace, with its enchanting loveliness, the wastes of a continent; a few flowery islets may stud the red seas of history; so life may be iradiated with a few transient, fleeting smiles;—still it is a fact, as one well observes, "that every man or woman, well advanced in years, has one expression, giving tone to the others, vanishing it may be for an hour, but always returning, and that an—expression of sorrow."

"The fool hath said there is no God,
But none, there is no sorrow."

"I will restore thy daughter to life again," said an Eastern sage to a prince, who grieved immoderately for the loss of a beloved daughter, "provided thou art able to engrave on her tomb-stone the names of three persons who have never mourned." The prince anxiously inquired for such, found the inquiry vain, and was silent.

Strange as it may seem, suffering is a part of the christian's legacy. "In the world ye shall have tribulation," were the words of Jesus to his disciples; while they in turn assure the early believers that it is "through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God;" and that "unto you it is given in behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but to suffer for his name's sake." Of the innumerable multitude of the redeemed "of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues," in their robes of white, with their palms of victory, and crowns of glory, it is said, "These are they that came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

"The path of sorrow, and that path alone,
Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown."

Bless the Lord, "sighing and sorrow" shall end in "everlasting joy and gladness" at the return of the Lord, and the "restitution of all things." Then, for the wailings of grief, will be heard the alleluias of the redeemed; then all the heart aches and agonies climbing from an overflowing heart to pour from the eyes in floods of tears, will give place to the "ecstasies unalloyed" of immortal existence. In the "inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading," "the inhabitant shall no more say I am sick." If "saved with an everlasting salvation," we shall bid an eternal farewell to death-beds, funeral processions, and grave-yards. No fine linen is made into shrouds; no marble is worked into monuments; no picturesque landscapes are laid out into cemeteries, in the sweet Eden home. Its stately trees are never cut for coffins! Then, since "these light afflictions work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," let us press forward, and soon "the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces."

"Give joy or grief, give ease or pain,
Take life or friends away;
But let me find them all again
In that eternal day."

The Bible.—To the more wise and thinking, to the more considerative and contemplative, the Bible recommends itself by those innate excellences which are self-evident characteristics of its divine original. If we look attentively, we shall soon be aware of God's image and superscription upon it. A mind rightly disposed by an humble, sincere subjection to its Maker, will easily discover the image of his wisdom in the awful depth of its mysteries; the image of his sovereignty in the commanding majesty of its style; the image of his unity in the wonderful harmony and symmetry of all its parts; the image of his holiness in the unspotted purity of its precepts; and the image of his goodness in the manifest tendency of the whole to the welfare and happiness of mankind in both worlds; in short, it is a work that fathers itself.—Matthew Henry.

☞ When we do what is good, or speak what is true, we should acknowledge the Lord as speaking through us, and we should claim no more merit to ourselves than we should if he had done these things without using us as instruments.

☞ When we rightly understand the nature of dependence, there is no more opposition between dependence upon the Lord and dependence upon the neighbor, than there is between love to the Lord and towards the neighbor.

☞ To keep your own secrets is wisdom, but to expect others to keep them for you is folly.

Hindrances to Religion.

"What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

For some reason the religion of the Bible is regarded by many as disgraceful. It has been so regarded by the wicked in all ages. Pride rejects it, and refuses to confess, and sue for mercy. Many who really feel its necessity, will not comply with its conditions; they know their duty, but self-adoring pride restrains them from doing it. Christ comes to them through some unpopular sect, and demands their hearts. He commands that they come out from the world, and follow him. They understand the requisition, and are almost persuaded to submit; but pride resists it. The contest is often sharp, and the issue doubtful. The sinner feels that something must be done, and yet he is unwilling to do just the right thing. At length a compromise is suggested, and he turns away to other teachers and other forms, where less humiliation is required, and settles into a lifeless system, in the vain hope of gaining the kingdom without the proper means. This change of position does not change the heart. Christ required him to take up the cross; but he has evaded it, and is the same sinner that he was before. His attempt to climb into the kingdom some other way, to accommodate his pride and self-conceit, will not succeed. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Prejudice is another source of danger; few escape its influence; no state of society is free from it, and especially in relation to religion. Even under the best examples and instructions, it presents a formidable obstacle to right action. Its power over the Jews, in relation to Christ, is but a fair illustration of its general influence. The early christians were also hated and persecuted by it, even unto death. The fact that they struck out upon a new course of life, and brought strange things to the ears of the people, was insufferable. Prejudice could brook no such invasion. Their perfect harmlessness of life was no protection.

Thus many of the present day contemn religion without giving it a hearing. They reject it "at sight," from sheer prejudice, no matter what it teaches, or what are its vouchers; they will not regard it; their education has been such, or they have suffered themselves to be so duped by false reports, and ridiculous anecdotes and jokes prejudicial to religion, that they have a sort of monomaniac aversion to the whole subject. They can believe anything against religion without evidence, but nothing in its favor, though supported by the strongest evidence. They will not, therefore, examine the subject; they "will not consider;" they shut their eyes against the light. They will neither read nor hear in any way to get good, but hardening themselves in pride and prejudice, they rush on, reckless, to perdition.

The fear of man is another obstacle. It has been truly said that it "bringeth a snare." Though without the least reason, its influence is unbounded. It makes the strongest hearts quake, even where it is known there is no danger. It is the most effective police force of hell in keeping sinners from Christ. God forbid that the reader should allow himself to lie under this moral nightmare for a single hour! It is a bondage, against which we ought to declare a war of extermination. It "hath torment;" no one can call himself a man, while under its power. Break away, reader! dare to do right! "Fear not them that kill the body," much less the scoffer; let men revile you if they will—let them call you fool, knave, madman—let them treat you as a robber or a thief; but do not let them scare you to perdition! Be a man! God's free man! free to do your duty—to do right, and that before the gaze of the universe.

We might mention other hindrances, but our limits will not allow of it; if these can be overcome, there is not much to fear from what remains.

S. H. Dunn.

☞ Dr. Steane, in his reminiscences of a visit to Sweden, describes the mode of saying grace. The company stand round the table, and at some considerable distance from it, the gentlemen, for the most part, if not always, with their hands clasped and held on their breasts. Profound silence ensues perhaps for a minute, or it may be two, when the ladies drop a curtesy, and the gentlemen make a bow, and then the company take their seats. After dinner there is sometimes an addition, one of the parties striking up a verse of some well-known hymn, when all join in singing it.

He that hath no money, needeth no purse.

For the Crisis.

"The Bane and Antidote are both before Me."—Shakspeare.

For every disease there is a cure. For every evil there is a remedy. For every error there is, in the word of God, a truth to oppose and root it out. Hence the constant contest that has ever existed in this world between good and evil, since the day when sin first entered to mar the beauty of creation, and prepare the way for the display of the power and goodness of God; to bring good out of evil; and, ultimately, to overcome evil with good, in the restoration of all things by Jesus Christ. The final victory is sure, though long delayed; the seed of the woman (Christ) shall crush the head of the serpent; when death shall be swallowed up in victory, at the resurrection of the just, in the kingdom of Christ, to be established at his second advent, in the new heavens and the new earth, the blessed abode of the righteous.

In the meantime, the contest between truth and error is still going on; and whenever the enemy comes in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord lifts up a standard against him; saying, hitherto shalt thou come, and no further; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed! The great difficulty is to discover and apply the true remedy for the evils flesh is heir to. There are some remedies that are worse than the disease, and only increase the evils they would cure. The vast multitude of infallible nostrums for prevailing diseases, only show that the true remedy is yet undiscovered; and that the doctors are only practicing on the credulity of their patients, or trying experiments with them for their own advantage. Quacks and empirics are by no means confined to physical diseases; there are any quantity of them who profess to have discovered infallible remedies for all moral and mental maladies; and with equal success; they only make bad worse. The great and good Physician has, in his sacred word, a sovereign remedy for every evil sin and Satan ever have or ever can invent to draw men away from the truth as it is in Jesus, and make them believe a lie.

In God's word there are treasures yet unexplored, heights and depths yet unfathomed; kept in store for the time of need, when they will be brought to light, to expose and frustrate the crafty designs of the enemy, and prepare a way for the child of God to escape the snare of the fowler, and secure a refuge in the hour of trial, that is to come upon all the earth. The man of sin, the son of perdition, the great infidel antichrist, whose advent is to be ushered in with signs and lying wonders, and all deceivableness of unrighteousness; to deceive the nations of the earth, and make them ripe for destruction. What if, in our day, this last manifestation of Satanic craft and malice should be developed in the universal spread of "Spiritualism," in all its corrupting influences; is the church of Christ prepared to contend against it? Have they any weapons, in such a contest, that will not recoil back upon themselves with double force? Is not this very system the natural fruit and legitimate offspring of the orthodox creed of centuries?—the immortality of the soul? If the dead are in a state of conscious existence between death and the resurrection, it is vain to deny the truth of Spiritualism; in fact, it is not attempted by those who hold this doctrine. They are obliged to acknowledge the theory is correct and true; but deny the practice, which only serves to stimulate a vain curiosity to investigate prohibited mysteries; as may be clearly seen by the rapid spread and development of this diabolical system throughout the world. Is there no antidote in the word of God for this strong delusion? Are there no means of escape from this overwhelming flood of modern witchcraft and demonology? Yes, blessed be God, in his word we have an all-sufficient remedy for this malignant disease; and it is the only remedy that can effect a radical cure.—"The dead know not any thing," they sleep in hades till the resurrection: "no work, nor device, nor knowledge" there! To those who believe the Bible, this ought to settle the question; that it is not dead men, but demons, evil spirits who personate the dead, to deceive the living. Just as Satan, their great leader, personates an angel of light for a like purpose.

It is not to be wondered at that Spiritualists hate the Bible, and treat it as an old almanac, of no authority in this enlightened age! It is the only book that exposes their system, and calls it by its real name, "Spiritual wickedness," "doctrines of demons." It may not be long before we shall need the whole armor of God, to contend against these wiles of the devil; and what will become of those who still cling to the long cherished error of man's immortality, in opposition to the word of God? Are they not in constant danger of falling over the precipice, on the brink of which they stand? One step more in the course they have taken may be a fatal one, and leave them in the power of the enemy, to lead them captive at his will; as is the case with thousands, who have renounced their own reason, and the word of God, and given themselves up to this fatal delusion, till they have proved the truth of the declaration, "he maketh diviners mad."

We live in fearful times. Never before was witchcraft so popular, so open and barefaced, as at this day. Men of talent and influence in society are amongst its zealous advocates; women of fascinating address and manners publicly display their talents, to gain proselytes to their system, and no means are left untried to induce the thoughtless, and those who have recently lost friends, to enter the "circles," and thus become entangled in the wiles of the adversary, who goeth about as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour.

It may not be long before this demon-worship may assume a political phase, and demand a place in our national counsels; before it is flattered and encouraged by designing politicians, in order to gain the spiritual influence at elections, and thus be enabled to insinuate its deadly poison into the vitals of our national prosperity. It is high time we should be made sensible of our danger, and, if possible, apply the remedy God has given us in his word, before it be too late.

LIFE.

'Tis not for man to trifle; life is brief,
And sin is here.
Our age is but the falling of a leaf,
A dropping tear.
We have no time to sport away the hours;
All must be earnest in a world like ours.

Not many lives, but only one have we;
One, only one—
How sacred should that one life ever be—
That narrow span?
Day after day filled up with blessed toil,
Hour after hour still bringing in new spoil.

Bro. Grant:—The following letter, cut from the Herald, points out a great evil among our churches. I ask its republication in the Crisis, and call special attention to it. Bro. W. has done his duty; let those who read take heed.

Encourage Young Ministers.

Few, indeed, seriously consider the trials and the temptations of the servant of Christ and the church, in his early experience in the ministry. Some there are who do; and such become the special friends of the ministers of Christ, because they have shown them kindness and sympathy, in their poverty and trials, and given them counsel and encouragement in times of temptation and opposition. There are some, it is true, who have such a degree of self-esteem, of native hope, combativeness, and firmness, that they need the check-bit, with strong restraining influences about them to keep them in their places. But with most men it is otherwise. Though they have faith in God, have believed he called them to preach the gospel of his Son, and have consecrated all to him and his work, there are many things which often come across the mind which almost overwhelm them.

First. He knows his work is great, and he feels inefficient.

Second. He knows that there are many other ministers more capable of teaching than himself; have had more experience, more study, greater advantages, and perhaps greater talent. He knows the people have heard good, able preaching, and many of them are not willing to hear anything else; that they take little notice of small men, either to hear, feed or support them. How can a man surmount all these difficulties without a mighty struggle of human nature? They never would do it, if the Lord had not some fathers and mothers in Israel.

I wish to call attention to this subject. How came there to be such strong able ministers as we now have? They were young once, diffident, slow of speech, perhaps, of small reading in the beginning, illiterate, perhaps awkward withal. But God called them to preach; they obeyed, some listened, gave them sympathy, counsel and a living, perhaps. It may have been some good old mother who cared for the servants of God. They improve; God disciplined them in his church and by his people.—And now they are able, fluent or powerful speakers, "mighty in the Scriptures." You who would have turned from them with derision, and scorned to support them in youth, now delight to hear them, and talk freely of the importance of supporting them, while other young ministers, of equal promise, you think little of, and those you would never had but for more considerate persons than yourselves.

When a young man commences to preach, it is generally thought he should go out into some back towns, among the ignorant and unbelievers, to instruct them, while the old, established, critical, theological believers must have well-trained, learned and sound theologians to teach them just what they now profess to know.

Many a church has starved out and died while making efforts to secure the labors of an efficient speaker, waiting months and years without a minister, because they could not get such as suited their controlling member's fancy. Young men might have been obtained and sustained, to the mutual benefit of all, but for this desire to gratify self, "the old man."

How often it has been said, "I don't care about going to meeting to hear that stripling preach. He is not much of a preacher—I can get more information reading." Or, "I don't want to hear a man preach, unless he knows more than I do. What do they think that young fellow can do here?"

All such remarks are made and many stay at home. The young man knows the state of the case, feels as though he had rather die; but God calls, the world is perishing, church-members are sleeping. He is determined to obey the Lord, yet he can do but little, because the Aarons and Hurs are scarce to stay up his hands. A living, active, consistent church, will do more with a mere stripling for their preacher, than a cold, theological, critical, speculative church under the labors of a D. D.

Consider the beautiful granite or marble pillars of a splendid temple, chiseled, and polished, and fitted for its place. It was once an uncomely, rough block, taken from the quarry. An experienced person in that art would think but little of it in that state; but now it has been hammered, chiseled, and polished. They look upon it with great delight, noticing its great beauty and its great utility. Yet all its excellent properties were in it when it was but the rough block. It only took the energetic, patient labor to prepare it for its present use and beauty. So it is with the servants whom the Lord calls to preach the gospel. They are not hewn, squared, chiseled, polished, and finished for the heavenly temple at the beginning of their ministry. It takes study, experience, trial, labor, counsel of brethren, the co-operation of the church, with the grace of God, to do it. Men often try to do it by school education, but as often fail. It is not obtained there. God's minister-school is the church,—His church.

Therefore, let us all consider that they should encourage the young men who give evidence that God has called them to the ministry.—Be ready to hear them preach, and feel interested in their discourses, even if they do not present anything new to you—nor present that as well as you could yourself. He is doing his best, and will improve by practice. Encourage him to come again. Tell him where to make improvement in his work; give also of your means to support him. He must live, and be clothed, as well as older ones. Many have been discouraged and left the work, because they were neglected and starved out. The church needs many more laborers. God has them to call, and will do it, if the church will sustain and take care of them. Shall it be done?

THE PEACE OF GOD.

We ask for Peace, oh Lord!
Thy children ask thy Peace;
Not what the world calls rest,
That toil and care should cease,
That through bright sunny hours
Calm life should fleet away,
And tranquil night should fade
In smiling day;
It is not for such Peace that we would pray.

We ask for Peace, oh Lord!
Yet not to stand secure,
Girt round with iron pride,
Contented to endure—
Crushing the gentle strings
That human hearts should know,
Untouched by others' joys
Or others' woe,
Thou, oh dear Lord, wilt never teach us so.

We ask thy Peace, oh Lord!
Through storm and fear and strife,
To light and guide us on,
Through a long struggling life;
While no success or gain
Shall cheer the desperate flight,
Or nerve what the world calls
Our wasted might;
Yet pressing through the darkness to the light.

It is thine own, oh Lord,
Who toil while others sleep;
Who sow with living care
What other hands shall reap;
They lean on thee entranced
In calm and perfect rest:
Give us that Peace, oh Lord!
Divine and blest,
Thou keepest for those hearts who love Thee best.

The Vale of Tears.

"Oh, think what crowds in every land
Are wretched and forlorn;
Through weary life this lesson learn—
That man was made to mourn!"

Upon a survey of the history of man in all ages; the records of oppressive government; of war; of the slave trade and slavery; of idolatry; of persecutions for opinion's sake; of sensualism, licentiousness and debauchery; in short, of the countless miseries resulting from dishonesty, intemperance, gambling, robbery, murder, and the thousand minor shades of guilt and guilty sorrows;—we feel that "the whole hemisphere of contemplation is inexpressibly dark and mysterious." The full record of MAN would be like the Prophet's Scroll, a volume whose entries would all be,—"lamentation, mourning and woe!"

Once, a happy, unsorrowing pair ambulated the green groves of Eden, that Paradise of delight in a world of beauty and enjoyment, canopied with heaven's serenest blue, and carpeted with living green, inwrought with nature's rich mosaic of virgin bloom; but "sin entered," and our venerable ancestors were exiled from the "garden of God," and doomed to sighing and sorrow till the winter of death should forever freeze the fountains of grief! And since Adam and Eve purloined the noxious fruit "of that forbidden tree," and, mantled in mourning, became outcasts from the Divine presence, and travelers toward the tomb—

"Scarce ever morning wore
To evening, but some heart did break."

The blightings of sin have tempest-swept the world, and it has become "a wilderness of woe." It is no longer a delectable clime, but a vast scorched Sahara; its fountains few, its palms withering, and the great caravans of nations moving through its stifling siroccos, and over its burning sands, to the desolations of the grave. The flickering lights of ancient history are thrown, in their dim reflections, across the lapse of ages, from the crimson surface of "oceans of blood," which have been kept brimming over by the red Amazons of mediæval and modern war.

The silken bonds of love and the tenderest friendships are rudely severed by death. A kind father to-day caresses his playful children; but anon faints in life's pilgrimage, breathes a farewell to "the loved ones at home," and sinks into the dreamless sleep. Somewhere on life's thorny pathway the warm pulses of the true heart of that kindest and best of human friends—the mother—stand still. Some "bow drawn at a venture" in the great "battle of life," sends an arrow to the manly breast of the doated son and trusted brother, and the turf-counterpane covers the parent's hope and the sister's pride. The crimson bloom is blanched by disease from the sister's fair cheek, and succeeded by the paleness of death, and the petals of that stately flower, the admired and loved of the family group, blend with the dust. And, "alas for love!"

"To-day, while hearts with rapture spring,
The youth to beauty's lips may cling;
To-morrow, and that heart of bliss
May sleep unconscious of his kiss."

The infant's cradle is to-day oscillated by the hand of love—to-morrow a little coffin encloses the miniature of man. An untimely frost chilled the tiny bud, and the blossom never unfolds. True, a few oases may checker the wildest desert; a single temple may grace, with its enchanting loveliness, the wastes of a continent; a few flowery islets may stud the red seas of history; so life may be irradiated with a few transient, fleeting smiles;—still it is a fact, as one well observes, "that every man or woman, well advanced in years, has one expression, giving tone to the others, vanishing it may be for an hour, but always returning, and that an—expression of sorrow."

"The fool hath said there is no God,
But none, there is no sorrow."

"I will restore thy daughter to life again," said an Eastern sage to a prince, who grieved immoderately for the loss of a beloved daughter, "provided thou art able to engrave on her tomb-stone the names of three persons who have never mourned." The prince anxiously inquired for such, found the inquiry vain, and was silent.

Strange as it may seem, suffering is a part of the christian's legacy. "In the world ye shall have tribulation," were the words of Jesus to his disciples; while they in turn assure the early believers that it is "through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God;" and that "unto you it is given in behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but to suffer for his name's sake." Of the innumerable multitude of the redeemed "of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues," in their robes of white, with their palms of victory, and crowns of glory, it is said, "These are they that came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

"The path of sorrow, and that path alone,
Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown."

Bless the Lord, "sighing and sorrow" shall end in "everlasting joy and gladness" at the return of the Lord, and the "restitution of all things." Then, for the wailings of grief, will be heard the alleluias of the redeemed; then all the heart aches and agonies climbing from an overflowing heart to pour from the eyes in floods of tears, will give place to the "ecstasies unalloyed" of immortal existence. In the "inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading," "the inhabitant shall no more say I am sick." If "saved with an everlasting salvation," we shall bid an eternal farewell to death-beds, funeral processions, and grave-yards. No fine linen is made into shrouds; no marble is worked into monuments; no picturesque landscapes are laid out into cemeteries, in the sweet Eden home. Its stately trees are never cut for coffins! Then, since "these light afflictions work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," let us press forward, and soon "the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces."

"Give joy or grief, give ease or pain,
Take life or friends away;
But let me find them all again
In that eternal day."

THE BIBLE.—To the more wise and thinking, to the more considerative and contemplative, the Bible recommends itself by those innate excellences which are self-evident characteristics of its divine original. If we look attentively, we shall soon be aware of God's image and superscription upon it. A mind rightly disposed by an humble, sincere subjection to its Maker, will easily discover the image of his wisdom in the awful depth of its mysteries; the image of his sovereignty in the commanding majesty of its style; the image of his unity in the wonderful harmony and symmetry of all its parts; the image of his holiness in the unspotted purity of its precepts; and the image of his goodness in the manifest tendency of the whole to the welfare and happiness of mankind in both worlds; in short, it is a work that fathers itself.—Matthew Henry.

☞ When we do what is good, or speak what is true, we should acknowledge the Lord as speaking through us, and we should claim no more merit to ourselves than we should if he had done these things without using us as instruments.

☞ When we rightly understand the nature of dependence, there is no more opposition between dependence upon the Lord and dependence upon the neighbor, than there is between love to the Lord and towards the neighbor.

☞ To keep your own secrets is wisdom, but to expect others to keep them for you is folly.

Hindrances to Religion.

"What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

For some reason the religion of the Bible is regarded by many as disgraceful. It has been so regarded by the wicked in all ages. Pride rejects it, and refuses to confess, and sue for mercy. Many who really feel its necessity, will not comply with its conditions; they know their duty, but self-adoring pride restrains them from doing it. Christ comes to them through some unpopular sect, and demands their hearts. He commands that they come out from the world, and follow him. They understand the requisition, and are almost persuaded to submit; but pride resists it. The contest is often sharp, and the issue doubtful. The sinner feels that something must be done, and yet he is unwilling to do just the right thing. At length a compromise is suggested, and he turns away to other teachers and other forms, where less humiliation is required, and settles into a lifeless system, in the vain hope of gaining the kingdom without the proper means. This change of position does not change the heart. Christ required him to take up the cross; but he has evaded it, and is the same sinner that he was before. His attempt to climb into the kingdom some other way, to accommodate his pride and self-conceit, will not succeed. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Prejudice is another source of danger; few escape its influence; no state of society is free from it, and especially in relation to religion. Even under the best examples and instructions, it presents a formidable obstacle to right action. Its power over the Jews, in relation to Christ, is but a fair illustration of its general influence. The early christians were also hated and persecuted by it, even unto death. The fact that they struck out upon a new course of life, and brought strange things to the ears of the people, was insufferable. Prejudice could brook no such invasion. Their perfect harmlessness of life was no protection.

Thus many of the present day contemn religion without giving it a hearing. They reject it "at sight," from sheer prejudice, no matter what it teaches, or what are its vouchers; they will not regard it; their education has been such, or they have suffered themselves to be so duped by false reports, and ridiculous anecdotes and jokes prejudicial to religion, that they have a sort of monomaniac aversion to the whole subject. They can believe anything against religion without evidence, but nothing in its favor, though supported by the strongest evidence. They will not, therefore, examine the subject; they "will not consider;" they shut their eyes against the light. They will neither read nor hear in any way to get good, but hardening themselves in pride and prejudice, they rush on, reckless, to perdition.

The fear of man is another obstacle. It has been truly said that it "bringeth a snare." Though without the least reason, its influence is unbounded. It makes the strongest hearts quake, even where it is known there is no danger. It is the most effective police force of hell in keeping sinners from Christ. God forbid that the reader should allow himself to lie under this moral nightmare for a single hour! It is a bondage, against which we ought to declare a war of extermination. It "hath torment;" no one can call himself a man, while under its power. Break away, reader! dare to do right! "Fear not them that kill the body," much less the scoffer; let men revile you if they will—let them call you fool, knave, madman—let them treat you as a robber or a thief; but do not let them scare you to perdition! Be a man! God's free man! free to do your duty—to do right, and that before the gaze of the universe.

We might mention other hindrances, but our limits will not allow of it; if these can be overcome, there is not much to fear from what remains.

☞ Dr. Steane, in his reminiscences of a visit to Sweden, describes the mode of saying grace. The company stand round the table, and at some considerable distance from it, the gentlemen, for the most part, if not always, with their hands clasped and held on their breasts. Profound silence ensues perhaps for a minute, or it may be two, when the ladies drop a courtesy, and the gentlemen make a bow, and then the company take their seats. After dinner there is sometimes an addition, one of the parties striking up a verse of some well-known hymn, when all join in singing it.

For the Crisis.

"THE BANE AND ANTIDOTE ARE BOTH BEFORE ME."—Shakspeare.

For every disease there is a cure. For every evil there is a remedy. For every error there is, in the word of God, a truth to oppose and root it out. Hence the constant contest that has ever existed in this world between good and evil, since the day when sin first entered to mar the beauty of creation, and prepare the way for the display of the power and goodness of God; to bring good out of evil; and, ultimately, to overcome evil with good, in the restoration of all things by Jesus Christ. The final victory is sure, though long delayed; the seed of the woman (Christ) shall crush the head of the serpent; when death shall be swallowed up in victory, at the resurrection of the just, in the kingdom of Christ, to be established at his second advent, in the new heavens and the new earth, the blessed abode of the righteous.

In the meantime, the contest between truth and error is still going on; and whenever the enemy comes in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord lifts up a standard against him; saying, hitherto shalt thou come, and no further; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed! The great difficulty is to discover and apply the true remedy for the evils flesh is heir to. There are some remedies that are worse than the disease, and only increase the evils they would cure. The vast multitude of infallible nostrums for prevailing diseases, only show that the true remedy is yet undiscovered; and that the doctors are only practicing on the credulity of their patients, or trying experiments with them for their own advantage. Quacks and empirics are by no means confined to physical diseases; there are any quantity of them who profess to have discovered infallible remedies for all moral and mental maladies; and with equal success; they only make bad worse. The great and good Physician has, in his sacred word, a sovereign remedy for every evil sin and Satan ever have or ever can invent to draw men away from the truth as it is in Jesus, and make them believe a lie.

In God's word there are treasures yet unexplored, heights and depths yet unfathomed; kept in store for the time of need, when they will be brought to light, to expose and frustrate the crafty designs of the enemy, and prepare a way for the child of God to escape the snare of the fowler, and secure a refuge in the hour of trial, that is to come upon all the earth. The man of sin, the son of perdition, the great infidel antichrist, whose advent is to be ushered in with signs and lying wonders, and all deceivableness of unrighteousness; to deceive the nations of the earth, and make them ripe for destruction. What if, in our day, this last manifestation of Satanic craft and malice should be developed in the universal spread of "Spiritualism," in all its corrupting influences; is the church of Christ prepared to contend against it? Have they any weapons, in such a contest, that will not recoil back upon themselves with double force? Is not this very system the natural fruit and legitimate offspring of the orthodox creed of centuries?—the immortality of the soul? If the dead are in a state of conscious existence between death and the resurrection, it is vain to deny the truth of Spiritualism; in fact, it is not attempted by those who hold this doctrine. They are obliged to acknowledge the theory is correct and true; but deny the practice, which only serves to stimulate a vain curiosity to investigate prohibited mysteries; as may be clearly seen by the rapid spread and development of this diabolical system throughout the world. Is there no antidote in the word of God for this strong delusion? Are there no means of escape from this overwhelming flood of modern witchcraft and demonology? Yes, blessed be God, in his word we have an all-sufficient remedy for this malignant disease; and it is the only remedy that can effect a radical cure.—"The dead know not any thing," they sleep in hades till the resurrection: "no work, nor device, nor knowledge" there! To those who believe the Bible, this ought to settle the question; that it is not dead men, but demons, evil spirits who personate the dead, to deceive the living. Just as Satan, their great leader, personates an angel of light for a like purpose.

It is not to be wondered at that Spiritualists hate the Bible, and treat it as an old almanac, of no authority in this enlightened age! It is the only book that exposes their system, and calls it by its real name, "Spiritual wickedness," "doctrines of demons." It may not be long before we shall need the whole armor of God, to contend against these wiles of the devil; and what will become of those who still cling to the long cherished error of man's immortality, in opposition to the word of God? Are they not in constant danger of falling over the precipice, on the brink of which they stand? One step more in the course they have taken may be a fatal one, and leave them in the power of the enemy, to lead them captive at his will; as is the case with thousands, who have renounced their own reason, and the word of God, and given themselves up to this fatal delusion, till they have proved the truth of the declaration, "he maketh diviners mad."

We live in fearful times. Never before was witchcraft so popular, so open and barefaced, as at this day. Men of talent and influence in society are amongst its zealous advocates; women of fascinating address and manners publicly display their talents, to gain proselytes to their system, and no means are left untried to induce the thoughtless, and those who have recently lost friends, to enter the "circles," and thus become entangled in the wiles of the adversary, who goeth about as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour.

It may not be long before this demon-worship may assume a political phase, and demand a place in our national counsels; before it is flattered and encouraged by designing politicians, in order to gain the spiritual influence at elections, and thus be enabled to insinuate its deadly poison into the vitals of our national prosperity. It is high time we should be made sensible of our danger, and, if possible, apply the remedy God has given us in his word, before it be too late.

LIFE.

'Tis not for man to trifle; life is brief,
And sin is here.
Our age is but the falling of a leaf,
A dropping tear.
We have no time to sport away the hours;
All must be earnest in a world like ours.

Not many lives, but only one have we;
One, only one—
How sacred should that one life ever be—
That narrow span?
Day after day filled up with blessed toil,
Hour after hour still bringing in new spoil.

BRO. GRANT:—The following letter, cut from the Herald, points out a great evil among our churches. I ask its republication in the Crisis, and call special attention to it. Bro. W. has done his duty; let those who read take heed.

Encourage Young Ministers.

Few, indeed, seriously consider the trials and the temptations of the servant of Christ and the church, in his early experience in the ministry. Some there are who do; and such become the special friends of the ministers of Christ, because they have shown them kindness and sympathy, in their poverty and trials, and given them counsel and encouragement in times of temptation and opposition. There are some, it is true, who have such a degree of self-esteem, of native hope, combativeness, and firmness, that they need the check-bit, with strong restraining influences about them to keep them in their places. But with most men it is otherwise. Though they have faith in God, have believed he called them to preach the gospel of his Son, and have consecrated all to him and his work, there are many things which often come across the mind which almost overwhelm them.

First. He knows his work is great, and he feels inefficient.

Second. He knows that there are many other ministers more capable of teaching than himself; have had more experience, more study, greater advantages, and perhaps greater talent. He knows the people have heard good, able preaching, and many of them are not willing to hear anything else; that they take little notice of small men, either to hear, feed or support them. How can a man surmount all these difficulties without a mighty struggle of human nature? They never would do it, if the Lord had not some fathers and mothers in Israel.

I wish to call attention to this subject. How came there to be such strong able ministers as we now have? They were young once, diffident, slow of speech, perhaps, of small reading in the beginning, illiterate, perhaps awkward withal. But God called them to preach; they obeyed, some listened, gave them sympathy, counsel and a living, perhaps. It may have been some good old mother who cared for the servants of God. They improve; God disciplined them in his church and by his people.—And now they are able, fluent or powerful speakers, "mighty in the Scriptures." You who would have turned from them with derision, and scorned to support them in youth, now delight to hear them, and talk freely of the importance of supporting them, while other young ministers, of equal promise, you think little of, and those you would never had, but for more considerate persons than yourselves.

When a young man commences to preach, it is generally thought he should go out into some back towns, among the ignorant and unbelievers, to instruct them, while the old, established, critical, theological believers must have well-trained, learned and sound theologians to teach them just what they now profess to know.

Many a church has starved out and died while making efforts to secure the labors of an efficient speaker, waiting months and years without a minister, because they could not get such as suited their controlling member's fancy. Young men might have been obtained and sustained, to the mutual benefit of all, but for this desire to gratify self, "the old man."

How often it has been said, "I don't care about going to meeting to hear that stripling preach. He is not much of a preacher—I can get more information reading." Or, "I don't want to hear a man preach, unless he knows more than I do. What do they think that young fellow can do here?"

All such remarks are made and many stay at home. The young man knows the state of the case, feels as though he had rather die; but God calls, the world is perishing, church-members are sleeping. He is determined to obey the Lord, yet he can do but little, because the Aarons and Hurs are scarce to stay up his hands. A living, active, consistent church, will do more with a mere stripling for their preacher, than a cold, theological, critical, speculative church under the labors of a D. D.

Consider the beautiful granite or marble pillars of a splendid temple, chiseled, and polished, and fitted for its place. It was once an uncomely, rough block, taken from the quarry. An experienced person in that art would think but little of it in that state; but now it has been hammered, chiseled, and polished. They look upon it with great delight, noticing its great beauty and its great utility. Yet all its excellent properties were in it when it was but the rough block. It only took the energetic, patient labor to prepare it for its present use and beauty. So it is with the servants whom the Lord calls to preach the gospel. They are not hewn, squared, chiseled, polished, and finished for the heavenly temple at the beginning of their ministry. It takes study, experience, trial, labor, counsel of brethren, the co-operation of the church, with the grace of God, to do it. Men often try to do it by school education, but as often fail. It is not obtained there. God's minister-school is the church,—His church.

Therefore, let us all consider that they should encourage the young men who give evidence that God has called them to the ministry.—Be ready to hear them preach, and feel interested in their discourses, even if they do not present anything new to you—nor present that as well as you could yourself. He is doing his best, and will improve by practice. Encourage him to come again. Tell him where to make improvement in his work; give also of your means to support him. He must live, and be clothed, as well as older ones. Many have been discouraged and left the work, because they were neglected and starved out. The church needs many more laborers. God has them to call, and will do it, if the church will sustain and take care of them. Shall it be done?

Ten copies to one address for 6 months	8.00
Twenty copies to one address for 6 months,	15.00
Thirty copies to one address for 6 months,	22.00

By the above arrangement, a single copy will be sent for 3 months for 50 cts., which will bring the papers within reach of all who are able to make any payment at all.

The price of five or more copies is reduced in proportion to the number sent to one address; so that, in places where there is a company of Brn., they may, by combining together, receive a large number at a low price, which will enable them to supply the poor within their own neighborhood.

Our proposition is, that all who have ability, when sending in the amount of their subscriptions, should send us as much in addition to their subscription as they are willing to give, for circulating the Crisis among the poor, which we all ought to feel under obligations to do.

Particular Rules for Correspondents.—Over all matters not intended for publication, write Private.

Over all communications for the paper, write For the Crisis.

Over all business matters write Business.

All who wish to receive the Crisis, should, in writing to this office, name the town, county and State in which they reside, and direct to Eld. MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.

Would'st thou a wanderer reclaim,
A wild and restless spirit tame;
Check the warm flow of youthful blood,
And lead a lost one back to God?
Pause, if the spirit's wrath be stirred,
Speak not to him a bitter word,
Speak not,—that bitter word may be
The stamp that seals his destiny.

If widely he has gone astray,
And dark excess has marked his way;
'Tis pitiful,—but yet beware,
Reform must come from kindly care.
Forbid thy parting lips to move,
But in the gentle tones of love;
Though sadly his young heart hath erred,
Speak not to him a bitter word.

The lowering frown he will not bear,
The venomed chidings will not hear;
The ardent spirit will not brook
The stinging tooth of sharp rebuke;
Thou would'st not goad the fiery steed,
To calm his rage or check his speed;
Then let no angry tones be heard,
Speak not to him a bitter word.

Go kindly to him—make him feel
Your heart yearns deeply for his weal;
Tell him the dangers thick that lay
Around his "widely devious way;"
So shalt thou win him, call him back
From pleasure's smooth, seductive track,
And warnings thou hast mildly given,
May guide the wanderer back to heaven.

Rome as it Was; Rome as it is Not; Rome as it Is.

BY ELDER S. S. BREWER.

NO. II.

First Head. Please read Gibbon, Vol. 8, p. 512.

"An epistle was addressed by their unanimous decree, to the Emperor Zeno, . . . who had lately been restored, after a short rebellion, to the Byzantine (Greek) throne. They solemnly disclaim the necessity, or even the wish, of continuing any longer the Imperial succession in Italy, since, in their opinion, the majesty of a sole monarch is sufficient to pervade and protect, at the same time, both the East and the West. In their own name, and in the name of the people, they consent that the seat of universal empire shall be transferred from Rome to Constantinople; and they basely renounce the right of choosing their master, THE ONLY VESTIGE THAT YET REMAINED OF THE AUTHORITY WHICH HAD GIVEN LAWS TO THE WORLD."

Thus we have a certainty concerning the first head. There can be no reasonable doubt on this point.

The Second Head. Hear one of the greatest historians.

"It was after the Nyceno Synod, and under the reign of the pious Irene, that the popes consummated the separation of Rome and Italy, by the translation of the empire to the less Orthodox Charlemagne. . . . By this decisive measure they would finally eradicate the claims of the Greeks; the majesty of Rome would be restored; the Latin Christians would be united, under a supreme head, in their ancient metropolis; and the conquerors of the West would receive their crown from the successors of St. Peter. The Roman church would acquire a zealous and respectable advocate; and, under the shadow of the Carlovingian power, the bishops might exercise, with honor and safety, the government of the city." See Gibbon, Vol. 5, pp. 40, 41.

Speaking of the departure of this once mighty power, the above historian remarks:—

"The dregs of the Carlovingian race no longer exhibited any symptoms of virtue or power, and the ridiculous epithets of the bard, the stammerer, the fat, and the simple, distinguished the tame and uniform features of a crowd of kings alike deserving of oblivion. By the failure of the collateral branches, the whole inheritance devolved to Charles the Fat, the last emperor of his family; his insanity authorized the desertion of Germany, Italy, and France: he was deposed in a diet, and solicited his bread from the rebels by whose contempt his life and liberty had been spared. According to the measure of their force, the governors, the bishops, and the lords, usurped the fragments of the falling empire; and some preference was shown to the female or illegitimate blood of Charlemagne. Of the greater part, the title and possession were alike doubtful, and the merit was adequate to the contracted scale of their dominions. Those who could appear with an army at the gates of Rome, were crowned emperors in the Vatican; but their modesty was more frequently satisfied with the appellation of Kings of Italy: and the whole term of seventy-four years may be deemed a vacancy, from the abdication of Charles the Fat to the establishment of Otho the First."

The Third Head. See Gibbon, Vol. 5, p. 55:—

Otho was of the noble race of the dukes of Saxony; and if he truly descended from Witikind, the adversary and proselyte of Charlemagne, the posterity of a vanquished people was exalted to reign over their conquerors. His father, Henry the Fowler, was elected by the suffrage of the nation, to save and institute the kingdom of Germany. Its limits were enlarged on every side by his son, the first and greatest of the Othos. . . . In the North, Christianity was propagated by the sword of Otho, the conqueror and apostle of the Slavic nations of the Elbe and the Oder: the marches of Brandenburgh and Heswick were fortified with German colonies; and the king of Denmark, the dukes of Poland and Bohemia, confessed themselves his tributary vassals. At the head of a victorious army, he passed the Alps, subdued the kingdom of Italy, delivered the pope, and forever fixed the Imperial crown in the name and nation of Germany. From that memorable era, two maxims of public jurisprudence were introduced by force and ratified by time. 1. That the prince, who was elected in the German diet, acquired, from that instant, the subject kingdoms of Italy and Rome. 2. But that he might not legally assume the titles of emperor and Augustus, till he had received the crown from the hands of the Roman pontiff."

Permit me to introduce a short extract from Hallam's Middle Ages, pp. 227, 228.

"The conquest of Italy, and the recovery of the imperial title, are indeed the most brilliant trophies of Otho the great; but he conferred far more unequivocal benefits upon his own country by completing what his father had begun, her liberation from the inroads of the Hungarians. Two marches, that of Misnia, erected by Henry the Fowler, and that of Austria, by Otho, were added to the Germanic territories by their victories.

A lineal succession of four descents, without the least opposition, seems to show that the Germans were disposed to consider their monarchy as fixed in the Saxon family. Otho II. and III. had been chosen each in his father's life-time, and during infancy. The formality of election subsisted at that time in every European kingdom; and the imperfect rights of birth required a ratification by public assent. If at least France and England were hereditary monarchies in the tenth century, the same may surely be said of Germany; since we find the lineal succession fully as well observed in the latter as in the former. But upon the immature and unexpected death of Otho III., a momentous opposition was offered to Henry, duke of Bavaria, (A. D. 1002,) a collateral branch of the reigning family. He obtained the crown, however, by what contemporary historians call an hereditary title, and it was not till his death, in 1024, the house of Saxony was deemed to be extinguished."

There is no difficulty, thus far, in finding a correct succession of heads in Europe, or, in plain terms, heads of the leopard beast.

Fourth Head. Professor Kohlrausch chief counsellor of the Board of Education of the Kingdom of Hanover, and late Prof. of History in the Polytechnic School, says: "Henry the Saxon died in the year 1024 aged 52, . . . near Gottengen, which had often been the seat of the Saxon emperors." See p. 137. "On his death the Germanic States, each under its duke, assembled for the election of a new emperor, upon the vast plains along both banks of the Rhine, between Mentz and Oppenheim. They were eight dukes; Conrad the younger, who exercised the ducal powers in Franconia, being still regarded as the king's country; Frederick of Upper Lorraine; Gonzelo of Lower Lorraine; Bernard of Saxony; Henry of Bavaria; Adelbert of Corinthia; young Ernest of Swabia, and Ulric of Bohemia. The Saxons, the eastern Franks, the Bavarians, and the Swabians, together with the Bohemians, encamped themselves on this side of the Rhine. The Rhenish Franks, and those of Lower and Upper Lorraine on the other side. Thus a splendid and numerous assembly of electors was here reflected on the waves of the great German stream . . . The voices after a long deliberation inclined in favor of the Frankish race, from which the two Conrads, surpassing all the rest in virtue and consideration, presented themselves. . . . Conrad the elder was elected. No king since Charlemagne had so well merited to occupy the imperial throne."

"Conrad, who died A. D. 1038, was succeeded by his son, Henry III., or, the the Black Prince, whom the Germans had chosen during his father's life. He was twenty-two years of age. The hopes formed of him were great, and they proved not unfounded; like his father, he was of a high mind and determined will."

The historian says,—

"No emperor, since the days of Charlemagne, maintained more vigorously the imperial dignity in Italy, Germany, and the neighboring lands, or ruled more powerfully within the limits of his extensive empire. . . . He died suddenly in A. D. 1056, aged thirty-seven years. . . . The princes recognized the succession of Henry's son immediately. He died A. D. 1106. . . . He was succeeded by Henry V., who, on the 13th day of April, A. D. 1111, was solemnly crowned emperor. Henry V. reigned till A. D. 1125, when he died suddenly. at Utrect, childless, and with him the House of Franconia became extinct."—Kohlrausch's History of Germany.

Says Hallam, in his Middle Ages,—

"A general assembly was determined by merit to elect Conrad, surnamed the Salic, a nobleman of Franconia. From this prince sprung three successive emperors, Henry III., Henry IV. and V. . . . At his death, in A D. 1125, the male line of the Franconian emperors was at an end."

Thus we see no difficulty in finding four heads to the leopard beast; no want of evidence to prove the legitimate succession thus far. With such conclusive evidence, we will now proceed to find a fifth.

The Fifth Head.—"On the death of Lothaire in 1138, the partisans of the house of Swabia made a hasty and irregular election of Conrad, in which the Saxon faction found itself obliged to acquiesce." Hallam, p. 230.

"Conrad died 1152, at Bamberg. He was a valiant, high-minded and noble-hearted man; and was universally esteemed. He recommended, as his successor, not his own son, too young to rule the nation, but his valiant nephew, Frederick Barbarrossa, one of the most powerful of all the German emperors. The whole bearing of his presence displayed the prince bound to rule and command. Frederick went to Rome and was crowned Emperor in St. Peter's, on the 18th of June, 1155. Frederick was drowned in the river Seleph, on the 10th day of June, 1190." "His eldest son, Frederick, Duke of Swabia, died at the siege of Acre."

The grief which the Emperor Frederick's death occasioned caused a French writer thus to speak:

"The news so deadly piercing even to the very marrow and bone, has wounded me so mortally that all hope and desire of life have passed from me. For I have heard that that immovable pillar of the Empire, Germany's tower of strength and its very foundation, and that morning star which surpassed all other stars in splendor, Frederick the mighty, has ended his life in the East. Thus no longer exists that strong lion whose majestic countenance and powerful arm frightened savage animals from devastation, subjected rebels, and made robbers live in peace and order."

And the degree to which the imperial dignity in general was raised by him, is expressed in the words of his chancellor, Raynald, at a diet at Besanion, where he said—"Germany possesses an emperor, but the rest of Europe only petty kings."

With the death of the emperor, Frederick Barbarrossa, which took place in A.D. 1190, commenced the grand interregnum which lasted until the time of the Emperor Charles I. of Spain, in A. D. 1516."

☞ By continual meditation on the Sacred Writings, a man naturally improves and advances in holiness, as a tree thrives and flourishes in a kindly and well-watered soil. All the fruits of righteousness show themselves at the proper season, as opportunity calls for them; and the words, which are to his actions what the leaves are to the fruit, fall not on the ground, but are profitable as well as ornamental. Everything in him and about him serves the purpose for which it was intended. His brethren are benefited by him, and his Maker is glorified.—Horne.

☞ The reason why he who truly loves his neighbor, loves also his enemy, is because his love is destitute of personality. It does not spring from self, nor does it attach to the person of another, nor require a personal return.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 12.

My Dear Sister:—We purpose now to examine those portions of Scripture that are quoted as proof of an entire sanctification of the whole being to God—a perfect cleansing from the guilt and pollution of sin, and complete deliverance from its power and indwelling.

The Savior pronounces a blessing upon the "pure in heart." Not those who, like the Pharisees, were pure only without, but upon those who were pure within, "pure in heart." Turn to Rom. 6: 1, 2,—"Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" Verse 6,—"Knowing this that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin." "Old man"—sinful and corrupt nature "is crucified"—"that the body of sin might be destroyed," for what? "That thenceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin." Not temporally "dead," for the apostle adds, "Now if we be dead with Christ," &c. "Dead to sin," verse 2. Also, verse 11,—"Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof."

The whole argument goes to show that the apostle refers to a "death" experienced in this "mortal" state of existence, and a resurrection to spiritual life. "Yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead." By the crucifixion of the "old man," the "carnal mind," with its "affections and lusts," is "destroyed;" as truly slain as was Christ, when crucified "for" sin, "for the expiation of sin;" and by the putting on of the "new man," Christ Jesus, the soul is quickened to life, and being "made free from sin, and become servants to God," the individual brings forth "fruit unto holiness, and the end" will be "everlasting life." Verse 22. "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—2 Cor. 7: 1. Here we find an entire cleansing from the "filthiness of the flesh and spirit," urged upon the christian, in order that the work of "holiness" may be perfectly wrought in them. In Paul's letter to the Galatians, he speaks of himself as having experienced that crucifixion or death with Christ referred to in Rom. 6th,—nevertheless he lives, yet not he, but Christ liveth in him, and the life he now lives in the flesh, is sustained by the faith of the Son of God. See chap. 2, verse 20. In the 5th chap. of Gal. he describes the "works of the flesh," and the "fruit of the Spirit," and then adds, "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts." If the "affections and lusts" of the "flesh" are "crucified," they no longer work; their "motions" are no longer felt; for that which is dead, has no longer motion, but is inactive.

In Ephesians we find the apostle exhorting those whom he addressed to "put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of" their "minds, and put on the new man, which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness." The "new man, created in righteousness and true holiness, after God," an image of God, is to be put on, instead of the "old man which is corrupt." They are not to be each "put on," but one is first "put off," and then the other "put on."

In Paul's address to his Thessalonian brethren, he prays thus: "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it." Did the apostle pray in accordance with the divine will, when he asked that the Thessalonian brethren might be sanctified wholly; their "spirit, soul, and body," and not only "sanctified," but preserved in this pure and "blameless" condition, unto the coming of Jesus Christ? Yea, verily! or he would not have added, "Faithful is he who hath called you, who also will do it." "Be ye holy."—1 Pet. 1: 16. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." "Sin is the transgression of the law." "He was manifested to take away our sins." "Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not."

Other Scriptures might be cited, to the same effect, but we have not room for them, even were it necessary to give them. Enough have been given for examination, and the question to be settled is not whether professed christians are thus "wholly sanctified," whether those who bear the name of Christ are "made free from sin, and have their fruit unto holiness," whether this is your or my experience; but does the Bible offer such a salvation to us, through Jesus Christ, and enjoin it upon us as our duty to attain unto this moral crucifixion—this death to sin? It is for the evidences we are to search, and that in God's book: if we find them, believe them, whether "any of the rulers" believe them or not.

Has God called us unto holiness? Is it the will of God, even our sanctification? Let the Bible answer.

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

The Necessity of Exercise.—The benefit of exercise to those whose occupation does not lead them to make any physical exertion, cannot be too highly estimated. The body must undergo a certain amount of fatigue to preserve its natural strength, and maintain all the muscles and organs in proper vigor. This activity equalizes the circulation, and distributes the blood more effectually through every part. Cold feet or a chill anywhere, shows that the circulation is languid there. The muscles, during exercise, press on the veins, and help forward the currents by quickening every vessel into activity. The valves of the heart are in this way aided in the work of sending on this stream, and relieved of a certain amount of labor. When exercise is neglected, the blood gathers too much about this central region, and the oppression about the heart, difficulty of breathing, lowness of spirit, anxiety and heaviness, numerous aches and stitches, are evidences of this stagnation. People are afraid to take exercise, because they fancy they want breath and feel weak, but the very effort would free the heart from this burden, by urging the blood forward to the extremities; it would ease their breathing by liberating the lungs from the same superabundance; it would make the frame feel active and light as the effect of equalized circulation and free action.—Laws of Health.

Dr. Hatch on Spiritualism.

Dr. B. F. Hatch, husband of Cora V. Hatch, the famous medium, has commenced a series of articles upon modern Spiritualism in the New York Herald. We copy the concluding portion of the first one:—

"The believers in Spiritual intercourse can now be numbered by millions, and embrace all classes of society among its votaries. Whether their faith has any basis in truth, or is the mere working of overwrought imagination, becomes a theme worthy of candid consideration and close criticism. There are various opinions of its utility or its practical workings upon society. The extensive opportunity which I have had, and that too among the first class of Spiritualists, of learning its nature and results, I think will enable me to lay just claims to being a competent witness in the matter.

I am aware that what I have to say will offend many who are less acquainted with the whole phenomena than myself, and such as may feel themselves involved, and will please others; but it is for neither purpose that I write, but that the inexperienced may more fully comprehend the dangers attending it. I am frequently asked if I still believe in the phenomena of Spiritualism? I answer, Yes. I should deem it more than a waste of time to write about what does not exist. Were I asked again, 'Do you know that spirits do actually communicate with mortals?' I answer, No; and I have not found a candid man who would give any other response. Knowledge is better than belief. What passes current as Spiritualism among its believers, I think may be set down as fifty per cent self-delusion, twenty five per cent psychology, fifteen per cent international imposition, and the remaining ten per cent is yet a matter of uncertainty. But through it all, I believe that there is a powerful influx of an infernal error into nearly all mediumistic minds which greatly corrupts the moral sensibility and proves almost universally most disastrous to its victims.

I have heard much of the improvement in individuals in consequence of a belief in Spiritualism. With such I have had no acquaintance. But I have known many whose integrity of character and uprightness of purpose rendered them worthy examples to all around, but who, on becoming mediums, and giving up their individuality, also gave up every sense of honor and decency. A less degree of severity in this remark will apply to a large class of both mediums and believers. There are thousands of high-minded and intelligent Spiritualists who will agree with me that it is no slander in saying that the inculcation of no doctrines in this country has ever shown such disastrous moral and social results as the spiritual theories.—Like all destructive pestilential miasma, which almost imperceptibly poisons the soul, it has made victims of tens of thousands of its votaries, and secretly crept into many other avenues of society, until it is almost popularizing these social conditions which every good citizen must most deeply deplore. Iniquities which have justly received the condemnation of centuries are openly upheld; vices which would destroy every wholesome regulation of society are crowned as virtues; prostitution is believed to be fidelity to self; marriage an outrage on freedom; love evanescent, and, like the bee, should sip the sweets wherever found; bastards are claimed to be spiritually begotten.—All change, of whatever nature, is believed to be an improvement, as there is no retrogression. Iniquity is only the effervescence of the outworkings of a heavenly destiny. God is shorn of his personality and becomes simply a permeating principle, the Bible a libel on common sense, and Christ a mere medium, hardly equal to the spiritual babies of 'this more progressive age.'

With such doctrines before us what have we to hope? That they are rapidly increasing no one can deny. The end is not yet. One thing is favorable: many of the more upright and intelligent among them are beginning to see this condition of things, and are setting their faces against it. But they are the exceptions, and not the rule. A blind infatuation appears to drive them headlong into the whirlpool of passion, and in their wild delirium they mistake and foondly read upon their banner damnation for 'liberty.'"

Idleness.—Said the distinguished Chatham to his son: "I would have inscribed upon the curtains of your bed, and the walls of your chamber 'If you do not rise early you can never make progress in any thing. If you do not set apart your hours of reading; if you suffer yourself or any one else to break in upon them, your days will slip through your hands unprofitable, and frivolous, and really unenjoyed by yourself.'"

☞ The longer you read the Bible, the more you will like it; it will grow sweeter and sweeter; and the more you get into the spirit of it, the more you will get into the spirit of Christ.—Romaine.

But that he might not legally assume the titles of emperor and Augustus, till he had received the crown from the hands of the Roman pontiff."

Permit me to introduce a short extract from Hallam's Middle Ages, pp. 227, 228.

"The conquest of Italy, and the recovery of the imperial title, are indeed the most brilliant trophies of Otho the great; but he conferred far more unequivocal benefits upon his own country by completing what his father had begun, her liberation from the inroads of the Hungarians. Two marches, that of Misnia, erected by Henry the Fowler, and that of Austria, by Otho, were added to the Germanic territories by their victories.

A lineal succession of four descents, without the least opposition, seems to show that the Germans were disposed to consider their monarchy as fixed in the Saxon family. Otho II. and III. had been chosen each in his father's life-time, and during infancy. The formality of election subsisted at that time in every European kingdom; and the imperfect rights of birth required a ratification by public assent. If at least France and England were hereditary monarchies in the tenth century, the same may surely be said of Germany; since we find the lineal succession fully as well observed in the latter as in the former. But upon the immature and unexpected death of Otho III., a momentous opposition was offered to Henry, duke of Bavaria, (A. D. 1002,) a collateral branch of the reigning family. He obtained the crown, however, by what contemporary historians call an hereditary title, and it was not till his death, in 1024, the house of Saxony was deemed to be extinguished."

There is no difficulty, thus far, in finding a correct succession of heads in Europe, or, in plain terms, heads of the leopard beast.

Fourth Head. Professor Kohlrausch chief counsellor of the Board of Education of the Kingdom of Hanover, and late Prof. of History in the Polytechnic School, says: "Henry the Saxon died in the year 1024 aged 52, . . . near Gottengen, which had often been the seat of the Saxon emperors." See p. 137. "On his death the Germanic States, each under its duke, assembled for the election of a new emperor, upon the vast plains along both banks of the Rhine, between Mentz and Oppenheim. They were eight dukes; Conrad the younger, who exercised the ducal powers in Franconia, being still regarded as the king's country; Frederick of Upper Lorraine; Gonzelo of Lower Lorraine; Bernard of Saxony; Henry of Bavaria; Adelbert of Corinthia; young Ernest of Swabia, and Ulric of Bohemia. The Saxons, the eastern Franks, the Bavarians, and the Swabians, together with the Bohemians, encamped themselves on this side of the Rhine. The Rhenish Franks, and those of Lower and Upper Lorraine on the other side. Thus a splendid and numerous assembly of electors was here reflected on the waves of the great German stream . . . The voices after a long deliberation inclined in favor of the Frankish race, from which the two Conrads, surpassing all the rest in virtue and consideration, presented themselves. . . . Conrad the elder was elected. No king since Charlemagne had so well merited to occupy the imperial throne."

"Conrad, who died A. D. 1038, was succeeded by his son, Henry III., or, the the Black Prince, whom the Germans had chosen during his father's life. He was twenty-two years of age. The hopes formed of him were great, and they proved not unfounded; like his father, he was of a high mind and determined will."

The historian says,—

"No emperor, since the days of Charlemagne, maintained more vigorously the imperial dignity in Italy, Germany, and the neighboring lands, or ruled more powerfully within the limits of his extensive empire. . . . He died suddenly in A. D. 1056, aged thirty-seven years. . . . The princes recognized the succession of Henry's son immediately. He died A. D. 1106. . . . He was succeeded by Henry V., who, on the 13th day of April, A. D. 1111, was solemnly crowned emperor. Henry V. reigned till A. D. 1125, when he died suddenly, at Utrect, childless, and with him the House of Franconia became extinct."—Kohlraush's History of Germany.

Says Hallam, in his Middle Ages,—

"A general assembly was determined by merit to elect Conrad, surnamed the Salic, a nobleman of Franconia. From this prince sprung three successive emperors, Henry III., Henry IV. and V. . . . At his death, in A. D. 1125, the male line of the Franconian emperors was at an end."

Thus we see no difficulty in finding four heads to the leopard beast; no want of evidence to prove the legitimate succession thus far. With such conclusive evidence, we will now proceed to find a fifth.

The Fifth Head.—"On the death of Lothaire in 1138, the partisans of the house of Swabia made a hasty and irregular election of Conrad, in which the Saxon faction found itself obliged to acquiesce." Hallam, p. 230.

"Conrad died 1152, at Bamberg. He was a valiant, high-minded and noble-hearted man; and was universally esteemed. He recommended, as his successor, not his own son, too young to rule the nation, but his valiant nephew, Frederick Barbarrossa, one of the most powerful of all the German emperors. The whole bearing of his presence displayed the prince bound to rule and command. Frederick went to Rome and was crowned Emperor in St. Peter's, on the 18th of June, 1155. Frederick was drowned in the river Seleph, on the 10th day of June, 1190." "His eldest son, Frederick, Duke of Swabia, died at the siege of Acre."

The grief which the Emperor Frederick's death occasioned caused a French writer thus to speak:

"The news so deadly piercing even to the very marrow and bone, has wounded me so mortally that all hope and desire of life have passed from me. For I have heard that that immovable pillar of the Empire, Germany's tower of strength and its very foundation, and that morning star which surpassed all other stars in splendor, Frederick the mighty, has ended his life in the East. Thus no longer exists that strong lion whose majestic countenance and powerful arm frightened savage animals from devastation, subjected rebels, and made robbers live in peace and order."

And the degree to which the imperial dignity in general was raised by him, is expressed in the words of his chancellor, Raynald, at a diet at Besanion, where he said—"Germany possesses an emperor, but the rest of Europe only petty kings."

With the death of the emperor, Frederick Barbarrossa, which took place in A.D. 1190, commenced the grand interregnum which lasted until the time of the Emperor Charles I. of Spain, in A. D. 1516."

☞ By continual meditation on the Sacred Writings, a man naturally improves and advances in holiness, as a tree thrives and flourishes in a kindly and well-watered soil. All the fruits of righteousness show themselves at the proper season, as opportunity calls for them; and the words, which are to his actions what the leaves are to the fruit, fall not on the ground, but are profitable as well as ornamental. Everything in him and about him serves the purpose for which it was intended. His brethren are benefited by him, and his Maker is glorified.—Horne.

☞ The reason why he who truly loves his neighbor, loves also his enemy, is because his love is destitute of personality. It does not spring from self, nor does it attach to the person of another, nor require a personal return.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 12.

My Dear Sister:—We purpose now to examine those portions of Scripture that are quoted as proof of an entire sanctification of the whole being to God—a perfect cleansing from the guilt and pollution of sin, and complete deliverance from its power and indwelling.

The Savior pronounces a blessing upon the "pure in heart." Not those who, like the Pharisees, were pure only without, but upon those who were pure within, "pure in heart." Turn to Rom. 6: 1, 2,—"Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" Verse 6, —"Knowing this that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin." "Old man"—sinful and corrupt nature "is crucified"—"that the body of sin might be destroyed," for what? "That thenceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin." Not temporally "dead," for the apostle adds, "Now if we be dead with Christ," &c. "Dead to sin," verse 2. Also, verse 11,—"Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof."

The whole argument goes to show that the apostle refers to a "death" experienced in this "mortal" state of existence, and a resurrection to spiritual life. "Yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead." By the crucifixion of the "old man," the "carnal mind," with its "affections and lusts," is "destroyed;" as truly slain as was Christ, when crucified "for" sin, "for the expiation of sin;" and by the putting on of the "new man," Christ Jesus, the soul is quickened to life, and being "made free from sin, and become servants to God," the individual brings forth "fruit unto holiness, and the end" will be "everlasting life." Verse 22. "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—2 Cor. 7: 1. Here we find an entire cleansing from the "filthiness of the flesh and spirit," urged upon the christian, in order that the work of "holiness" may be perfectly wrought in them. In Paul's letter to the Galatians, he speaks of himself as having experienced that crucifixion or death with Christ referred to in Rom. 6th,—nevertheless he lives, yet not he, but Christ liveth in him, and the life he now lives in the flesh, is sustained by the faith of the Son of God. See chap. 2, verse 20. In the 5th chap. of Gal. he describes the "works of the flesh," and the "fruit of the Spirit," and then adds, "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts." If the "affections and lusts" of the "flesh" are "crucified," they no longer work; their "motions" are no longer felt; for that which is dead, has no longer motion, but is inactive.

In Ephesians we find the apostle exhorting those whom he addressed to "put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of" their "minds, and put on the new man, which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness." The "new man, created in righteousness and true holiness, after God," an image of God, is to be put on, instead of the "old man which is corrupt." They are not to be each "put on," but one is first "put off," and then the other "put on."

In Paul's address to his Thessalonian brethren, he prays thus: "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it." Did the apostle pray in accordance with the divine will, when he asked that the Thessalonian brethren might be sanctified wholly, their "spirit, soul, and body," and not only "sanctified," but preserved in this pure and "blameless" condition, unto the coming of Jesus Christ? Yes, verily! or he would not have added, "Faithful is he who hath called you, who also will do it" "Be ye holy"—1 Pet. 1: 16. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." "Sin is the transgression of the law." "He was manifested to take away our sins." "Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not."

Other Scriptures might be cited, to the same effect, but we have not room for them, even were it necessary to give them. Enough have been given for examination, and the question to be settled is not whether professed christians are thus "wholly sanctified," whether those who bear the name of Christ are "made free from sin, and have their fruit unto holiness," whether this is your or my experience; but does the Bible offer such a salvation to us, through Jesus Christ, and enjoin it upon us as our duty to attain unto this moral crucifixion—this death to sin? It is for the evidences we are to search, and that in God's book: if we find them, believe them, whether "any of the rulers" believe them or not.

Has God called us unto holiness? Is it the will of God, even our sanctification? Let the Bible answer.

Yours as ever, M. D. W.

The Necessity of Exercise.—The benefit of exercise to those whose occupation does not lead them to make any physical exertion, cannot be too highly estimated. The body must undergo a certain amount of fatigue to preserve its natural strength, and maintain all the muscles and organs in proper vigor. This activity equalizes the circulation, and distributes the blood more effectually through every part. Cold feet or a chill anywhere, shows that the circulation is languid there. The muscles, during exercise, press on the veins, and help forward the currents by quickening every vessel into activity. The valves of the heart are in this way aided in the work of sending on this stream, and relieved of a certain amount of labor. When exercise is neglected, the blood gathers too much about this central region, and the oppression about the heart, difficulty of breathing, lowness of spirit, anxiety and heaviness, numerous aches and stitches, are evidences of this stagnation. People are afraid to take exercise, because they fancy they want breath and feel weak, but the very effort would free the heart from this burden, by urging the blood forward to the extremities; it would ease their breathing by liberating the lungs from the same superabundance; it would make the frame feel active and light as the effect of equalized circulation and free action.—Laws of Health.

Dr. Hatch on Spiritualism.

Dr. B. F. Hatch, husband of Cora V. Hatch, the famous medium, has commenced a series of articles upon modern Spiritualism in the New York Herald. We copy the concluding portion of the first one:—

"The believers in Spiritual intercourse can now be numbered by millions, and embrace all classes of society among its votaries. Whether their faith has any basis in truth, or is the mere working of overwrought imagination, becomes a theme worthy of candid consideration and close criticism. There are various opinions of its utility or its practical workings upon society. The extensive opportunity which I have had, and that too among the first class of Spiritualists, of learning its nature and results, I think will enable me to lay just claims to being a competent witness in the matter.

I am aware that what I have to say will offend many who are less acquainted with the whole phenomena than myself, and such as may feel themselves involved, and will please others; but it is for neither purpose that I write, but that the inexperienced may more fully comprehend the dangers attending it. I am frequently asked if I still believe in the phenomena of Spiritualism? I answer, Yes. I should deem it more than a waste of time to write about what does not exist. Were I asked again, 'Do you know that spirits do actually communicate with mortals?' I answer, No; and I have not found a candid man who would give any other response. Knowledge is better than belief. What passes current as Spiritualism among its believers, I think may be set down as fifty per cent self-delusion, twenty five per cent psychology, fifteen per cent international imposition, and the remaining ten per cent is yet a matter of uncertainty. But through it all, I believe that there is a powerful influx of an infernal error into nearly all mediumistic minds which greatly corrupts the moral sensibility and proves almost universally most disastrous to its victims.

I have heard much of the improvement in individuals in consequence of a belief in Spiritualism. With such I have had no acquaintance. But I have known many whose integrity of character and uprightness of purpose rendered them worthy examples to all around, but who, on becoming mediums, and giving up their individuality, also gave up every sense of honor and decency. A less degree of severity in this remark will apply to a large class of both mediums and believers. There are thousands of high-minded and intelligent Spiritualists who will agree with me that it is no slander in saying that the inculcation of no doctrines in this country has ever shown such disastrous moral and social results as the spiritual theories.—Like all destructive pestilential miasma, which almost imperceptibly poisons the soul, it has made victims of tens of thousands of its votaries, and secretly crept into many other avenues of society, until it is almost popularizing these social conditions which every good citizen must most deeply deplore. Iniquities which have justly received the condemnation of centuries are openly upheld; vices which would destroy every wholesome regulation of society are crowned as virtues; prostitution is believed to be fidelity to self; marriage an outrage on freedom; love evanescent, and, like the bee, should sip the sweets wherever found; bastards are claimed to be spiritually begotten.—All change, of whatever nature, is believed to be an improvement, as there is no retrogression. Iniquity is only the effervescence of the outworkings of a heavenly destiny. God is shorn of his personality and becomes simply a permeating principle, the Bible a libel on common sense, and Christ a mere medium, hardly equal to the spiritual babies of 'this more progressive age.'

With such doctrines before us what have we to hope? That they are rapidly increasing no one can deny. The end is not yet. One thing is favorable: many of the more upright and intelligent among them are beginning to see this condition of things, and are setting their faces against it. But they are the exceptions, and not the rule. A blind infatuation appears to drive them headlong into the whirlpool of passion, and in their wild delirium they mistake and fondly read upon their banner damnation for 'liberty.'"

Idleness.—Said the distinguished Chatham to his son: "I would have inscribed upon the curtains of your bed, and the walls of your chamber 'If you do not rise early you can never make progress in any thing. If you do not set apart your hours of reading; if you suffer yourself or any one else to break in upon them, your days will slip through your hands, unprofitable, and frivolous, and really unenjoyed by yourself.'"

☞ The longer you read the Bible, the more you will like it; it will grow sweeter and sweeter; and the more you get into the spirit of it, the more you will get into the spirit of Christ.—Romaine.

For the Crisis.

Restoration.

When God created this world, he pronounced it good; it was radiant with glory. Then man was holy, and every thing was peace, happiness and harmony; there was no sickness, no pain, grief nor sorrow. Death was not known in all the world before the fall of man. Man was in sweet companionship with angels, and in harmony with his Maker.

But, alas! a change has come over this world. Man disobeyed; sin entered, and death by sin, therefore death is passed upon all, for all have sinned. God called unto Adam and said to him, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee—saying, thou shalt not eat of it; cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. So the Lord God drove out the man from the garden of Eden.

A dark eclipse then came over this world. What was once bright and beautiful, has been blighted and darkened by the enemy of man. The garden, which was once the abode of happiness, is now desolate, and a place of thorns, corruption and graves. What a sad, lamentable sight this entire world presents! Disorder, suffering and death. Cold storms, earthquakes, volcanoes, barren fields, and pestilential air. And man has become wicked, an alien from God by nature. All the elements seem to have been jarred into disorder. Like Cain in his wanderings, we must now walk this fitful earth in continual fear, lest we should find our death in everything we meet. Plague is in the food we eat, the water we drink, and in the air we breathe. Death comes in at our windows, and creeps through all the crevices of our dwellings, and, however long we may maintain the fight, the end of each one is to fall at last, and to decay.

Such is man, and the system with which he is connected. We contemplate it with sadness. We can find much in this world that is lovely, but it is marred. Nature groans for deliverance.

But this world is not an utter wreck—not a hopeless ruin. It shall yet be restored. God shall send Jesus Christ, whom the apostles preached, who suffered on the cross for our sins, and died, and was buried; and who arose on the third day, as the ever living and immortal Son of God and Redeemer of fallen man. He is to restore all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, and he shall create new heavens and a new earth.

We claim the earth abideth forever, and the redeemed of the Lord shall abide therein forever and ever, but the wicked shall be rooted out of it; they shall be burned up root and branch. Hear what the Psalmist David says;—"Let the sun and the moon, and all the stars of light, praise the Lord! for he commanded and they were created. He hath also established them forever and ever." Solomon says,—"The earth abideth forever ..... the righteous shall inherit the land and dwell therein forever." Daniel in vision of the last days and things, after the descent of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, saw the kingdom and dominion and greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, given to the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom.

Thus the ancient prophets speak; neither does the language of the New Testament on this subject differ from the Old; Jesus said,—"Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth." According to the apostle Paul, (Rom. 4: 13,) the promise to Abraham and to all his seed is, that they shall be heirs of the world. Peter gives it as the promise of God and the hope of the saints, that the earth, though the fires of the last day will pass over it, is yet to be the home of the saints. The earth is not to pass away. According to John,—"We shall reign on the earth." And as John looked down the pathway of futurity, beyond the day of judgment, he saw a new heaven and a new earth, and the New Jerusalem descending upon it. "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying—"Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them and be their God. And he shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away." Amen.

Now what is there in all this that looks like the everlasting disappearance of the globe itself, as some suppose? Joel has spoken otherwise. You remember the miracle at the marriage in Cana. Jesus could just as easily have filled the water pots with wine without requiring them first to be filled with water. But he preferred to take a present element, and from that to develop the fruits of his power. So in feeding the five thousand in the wilderness; he, could just as easily have dispensed with the few scanty loaves and fishes; but he chose to take what they had; and to make that the basis of his wonderful provisions. It would not be more difficult for him to create a new race of men upon earth than to redeem its present ones; but it seems best to him to take the old materials and out of them to effect his great ends of goodness.

He is not prodigal in the use of his power. Every fragment must be gathered that nothing be lost. He always takes the sinner to make the saint, and the dying corrupt body to make an immortal one. It is argued thus as he brings the new man out of the old Adam, and the glorified body out of the natural body, and the new harvest out of the old seed. So he will also bring the new heavens and new earth out of the old heavens and old earth, and thus make a paradise of God out of this very wilderness our present dwelling-place. Yes, these very hills and valleys shall yet be made glad with the songs of a finished Redemption; and this groaning earth shall yet become the blessed and everlasting home of man made immortal.

Queries for the Editor.

To Bro. Grant.—1. Do you not concede too much in your discussion with Dr. Litch, p. 10, when you admit that man is composed of body, soul, and spirit?

2. Does not your own reasoning contradict this admission, when you prove that the being whom God formed, whose "distinctive parts" were made of the dust, was man before he had life or mind?

3. Was not soul and spirit (life and mind) the result of the breath breathed into man's nostrils, as the motion and time of a watch are the result of winding the watch, and not a part of its composition?

With much deference, H. Pratt.

Reply to Bro. H. Pratt.—Dear Bro.,—We cheerfully answer your inquiries, as we see that there is a misapprehension of our position. When we admitted on p. 10 of the discussion that man is composed of "body, soul and spirit," we did not mean by spirit, the mind, but "the breath of life" which was breathed into Adam's nostrils; and when we make this admission, we have reference only to a living man. This "breath of life" leaves man at death. Hence we read in Ps. 104: 29, "Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, or spirit, they die, and return to their dust." The word here rendered breath is the same that is rendered spirit in Eccl. 12: 7, where it is said, "the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." When we made the admission, it would have been better had we given an explanation as above. The word spirit is sometimes used to represent a state of feeling; as, "haughty spirit," "humble spirit."—"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit (or feeling) that we are the children of God." What is the feeling when we have this witness? "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace," &c. These fruits are known and manifested by feeling. When spirit is thus used, it does not represent breath which is essential to sustain the life of all living creatures on this planet, and without which, the life and mind cease, and the being dies; but a state of feeling in the living being.

In short, we would say in the language of David, man's "breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." Ps. 146: 4.

The World's Crisis.

MILES GRANT.....EDITOR.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 16, 1859.

Office....167 Hanover street.

☞ The earnest attention of our readers is directed to our article in the first column of the next page, relating to the enlargement and improvement of the Crisis.

The Soul.—No. 18.

In this, our last article on the soul, we purpose to give all the passages in the New Testament where psukee is used and not rendered soul. It is rendered soul fifty-eight times; and if any of our readers think of any passages not explained which appear to conflict with the position we have taken, or any that are left in obscurity, that they wish explained, if they will send them to us, we will gladly notice them.

Psukee is rendered life and lives forty times. 'They are dead which sought the young child's life.' Matt. 2: 20. 'Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on; is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?' Matt. 6: 25. 'He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake, shall find it.' Matt. 10: 39. 'For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it.' Matt. 16: 25. 'The Son of man came ... to give his life a ransom for many.' Matt. 20: 28. 'Is it lawful ... to save life or to kill?' Mk. 3: 4. 'For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it.' Mk. 8: 35. "The Son of man came ... to give his life a ransom for many.' Mk. 10: 45. 'Is it lawful ... to save life, or to destroy it?' Lk. 6: 9. 'Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it.' Lk. 9: 24. 'The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them.' Lk. 9: 56. 'Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment.' Lk. 12: 22, 23. "If any man come to me, and hate not his ... own life also, he cannot be my disciple.' Lk. 14: 26. 'Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it.' Lk. 17: 33. 'The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.' John 10: 11. 'I lay down my life, that I might take it again.' John 10: 15. 'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again.' John 10: 17. 'He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal.' John 12: 25. 'I will lay down my life for thy sake. Jesus answered him, wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake?' John 13: 37, 38. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.' John 15: 13.

'Men that hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.' Acts 15: 26. 'Trouble not yourselves; for his life is in him.' Acts 20: 10. 'Neither count I my life dear unto myself.' Acts 20: 24. 'I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives.' Acts 27: 10. 'There shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship.' Acts 27: 22. 'I am left alone, and they seek my life.' Rom. 11: 3. 'Who have for my life laid down their own necks.' Rom. 16: 4. 'Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life to supply your lack of service toward me.' Phil. 2: 30. 'He laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.' 1 John 3: 16. 'The creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died.' Rev. 8: 9. 'They loved not their lives unto the death.' Rev. 12: 11. Total, 40.

Psukee is rendered mind three times. 'The unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected against the brethren.' Acts 14: 2. 'Stand fast in one spirit with one mind.' Phil. 1: 27. 'Consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.' Heb. 12: 3.

Psukee is rendered you once. 'I will very gladly spend and be spent for you.' 2 Cor. 12: 15.

Psukee is rendered heart once. 'Doing the will of God from the heart.' Eph. 6: 6.

Psukee is rendered us once. 'How long dost thou make us to doubt.' John 10: 24.

Psukee is rendered heartily once. 'And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto man.' Col. 3: 23.

In conclusion, we would remark that, after surveying the whole Bible on this subject, in our honesty, we can come to no other decision than that soul no where represents, in the Bible, a conscious part of man existing as such when the physical organism is sleeping in death. We are fully satisfied that the popular theology of the day, on this point, is sustained neither by facts, true philosophy, common sense, nor the Bible.

Poultney.

We have more good news to give about the people in this place. The Lord is doing a great work here. Notwithstanding the earnest efforts that some have made to hedge up the way of truth, and turn light into darkness, the cause of Christ is advancing gloriously. New testimonies are heard every evening. About one hundred have been converted or reclaimed. Lord's day morning, Feb. 6th, we met at 9 1-2 o'clock for a love feast, and in one hour there were one hundred and four witnesses who testified for Jesus, and about twenty-five more who rose expressing a desire to speak if there was time. Truly it was a love feast in a heavenly place. In the afternoon, eight more were baptized, making sixty in all. Several others are intending to be buried with Christ in baptism at the next opportunity. In the evening, we sat down to the table of the Lord to commemorate the death and sufferings of our Savior. It was a heavenly place. After the sacrament, the seats about the table were vacated, and twenty-eight mourners came forward and occupied them, requesting prayers. Several of them found peace in believing. The Methodists are now holding meetings every evening, and we learn that happy results attend their labors. The Congregationalists and Baptists in East Poultney are also holding extra meetings, which are characterized with an increasing interest, and it is hoped a general revival will be enjoyed throughout the town and those adjoining.

Monday and Wednesday evenings, 7th and 9th, we had meetings in the M. E. Church at Wells, about eight miles from Poultney. The house was very full of attentive listeners. We spoke the first evening on the reward of the righteous, and the second on the punishment of the wicked. Several clergymen were present, some of whom asked questions at the close of the meeting. There were seven different individuals who asked questions the last evening, which assisted in bringing out the truth. Some intelligent men remarked that the doctrine of eternal misery had been the cause of their leaving the worship of God, and turning to infidelity.

The more we observe the sad effects of that God-dishonoring doctrine, the better satisfied we become that it is the most fruitful source of infidelity; and we are resolved, in the strength of the Lord, to wage a perpetual war against it, so long as we have power to do so. We see the most happy results arising from preaching and believing the Bible doctrine, that the wicked are to be literally destroyed, and "be as though they had not been."

Three Things.

1.—Campmeetings.

If our friends, in different parts of the country, wish for several campmeetings this year, let them begin now to prepare to sustain them above board. Do not let them be a flat! Lay by all the loose change you can from this time till campmeeting time, and then you will have something to go with, and feel free.

2.—"Church Order."

Our friends, in the different states, are coming into gospel order, and, as a consequence, God is blessing them greatly. God will bless His own order! Let this work go on. Let those all alone who growl and find fault; God will handle them in due time. Stick to God, truth, and Bible order!

3.—"Time."

I have examined the new "time argument" that is being sent to our friends. It is not true. If you trust it, you will regret it sorely. "Take heed." "Cease from man."

Questions in behalf of the Church.

TO THOS. L. SALTONSTALL.

1. As the "dwellers on the earth" are deceived by the two-horned beast's miracles, does it not follow that the undeceived ones are the ones threatened—even "as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed?"

As those who do not worship the beast and his image, or receive his mark, are the ones to be killed, does it not follow that they are of another class, even the "sea-glass victors?" Rev. 15: 2.

2. Does not John see equally plain a "bloody power" in this two-horned beast, who causeth all, or as many as would not worship the image should be KILLED, as he does that of the dragon or leopard?

3. Though "the two-horned beast does not get the seat or great authority from the Leopard," does that prove "that he is much weaker than the Leopard," when God declares that he exerciseth ALL the power of the first beast before him?"

4. Does "the church encounter a power to consume and destroy" unto the end, in Dan. 7: 26, as you quote; or is it the Leopard beast power that is to consume after the forty-two months are past?

5. Is it certain proof that the two-horned beast and the false prophet are distinct powers, because that the miracles performed are before and after the image is made? Is it not rather supposable that the power which worked "wonders" to cause the image to be made, would persist in his deceivable course after the image was made? Yours desiring instruction,

H. Pratt.

For the Crisis.

Work! Work!

How much is said, sung, printed, read and thought about work. Bro. A. would have all at work in some vocation. Bro. B. would have them work in no way but pray and preach Sundays; while C. thinks it should be reversed. D. steps up and says it is only certain persons that should work, while he and his family live at ease. But what says the old Book? Addressing the church as a whole, they are commanded to work, and I have come to the conclusion that every day is a working day. I don't mean house work, but heart and tongue work. And here I must acknowledge my own deficiency in this work.

Here are a few enlightened souls,—lambs 'mid wolves. They need to build one another up in their most holy faith. Well, those who ought to speak, and weep Sunday nights because they don't, are looked upon in this light:—"There is Sr. So and So,—she has an education, is somebody,—she don't speak, and what can I say to edify her?" Thus you see the might-be star becomes a will-be stumbling block,—the "city on a hill," a "light under a bushel." In this way the church goes on Sabbath succeeding Sabbath,—the same old song is sung continually. The human mind requires variety,—must have it, or will lose all interest. The Elder, too wants to hear an echo from every corner of his field,—wants every string belonging to the great life-harp to vibrate to his comfort, and to the honor of the cause.

Nothing looks more pitiful in a church than to see its pastor, worn out with toil and care, sitting in the midst of those whom he has been instrumental in enlightening, and urging them almost in tears to testify of the love of God. O, dear pilgrims, I believe that God watches us, and will not smile if we fail to say a word for Jesus. Who will deny the assertion?

God has given us mind, and the power of speech—enough to talk about, and we must overcome the flesh, and "confess" him with our lips. Here is a rule that my nature cannot abide by; but what is impossible for the power of divine grace? It is a cross,—so will the crown be something weighty,—an "eternal weight of glory!" Who would lose it? Who will win it? The "faithful to the end" sort.—Faithful in what? In the "all things,"—talking, and every other christian duty. Says one, "Speaking in public is not essential to salvation." Granted,—nor is baptism alone; but take every observance together, and you have what was given for us. Let us not separate God's rules and regulations.

This is the time for fight. Come out boldly and take a seat in the second class car, bound for the Kingdom, through the city of Much Tribulation. No gloves, no dainties. Each to his post, but not to sleep. Let religion be every thing. It is but for a moment. Jesus is soon coming. Do you only say so, or do you actually believe it? If so, fight for truth. Now is the time, right down here in 1859. Don't wait till next year. Look about you, and see what the world knows, and compare it with what you have received, and then—work! May God grant the writer this grace. It is easier to say than to do.

For the Crisis.

This World is not our Home.

This world is beautiful, and yet all that tends to make it beautiful decays. The flowers that spring up around us are perpetually withering, and ruin and desolation mark continually our pathway. The hand of death rests not on the aged and infirm only, but the young, the gifted and the noble alike fall victims to the destroyer. The wealthy and the proud too must die. In this life we are subject to every variety of change, and no true and lasting happiness can be found save in the religion of Jesus. Upon all things here are written the solemn words, Passing away! Oh, yes—wealth, beauty, fame, honor, and even friendship fades. Nothing save the love of God is unchanging. But we rejoice in the hope of a change which is to take place at the appearing of Jesus—a change which to the saints will be glorious, for then will our conflicts be over, and the warfare be ended; then will the blighting curse be removed, and earth again bloom with unfading verdure in all its Eden-like beauty.

This is truly a blessed hope that Jesus at his coming will change these vile bodies, and fashion them like unto his glorious body. Then shall the jewels beneath the church-yard mounds come forth; and methinks I can see the rising myriads, the holy throng, without one spot or stain, on which death cannot again fasten. Thank God, no more heart-treasures can be his spoil, and the deadly arrows can no more touch the immortal ones. And as memory wanders over the days that are past, I see a happy household band. Ah! yes, too happy for the enemy to pass unnoticed, and he laid his finger upon the loved one, the mother of that group, and she sleeps in the churchyard. And while I sometimes weep at the thoughts of that loss, I rejoice for the evidence I have of again meeting her in immortal beauty. The same sweet voice that soothed my sorrows here, I expect to hear on the new earth, blending with the music of the golden harps in anthems of praise.

And how heart cheering to the pilgrim, who has long been tossed on time's surges, are the visions of the new earth. And then, after the toils of the day, having the assurance that we are heirs to the promised land! Oh! then to behold the beauteous scenes of that bright world of bliss. To view the river of life meandering amid the flower-clad vales, its crystal waves sparkling in the sunlight; while the tree of life stands on its fair banks, yielding its fruits to the innumerable company assembled beneath its shade. Peace and love every where meet the admiring gaze. But just as it seems to be a reality, the vision vanishes like a vapor-wreath before the morning sun; and the beauty of the new earth is exchanged for this vale of tears, and life's sorrows before us.

But when shall we realize all this? Oh, when Jesus comes, this will be real. Then cheer up, ye weary ones, if faithful, the glories of the kingdom shall be ours; we shall see the King in his beauty. Oh! let us try to be enduring ones, that we may be saved finally; and that we may be preserved blameless and spotless unto his coming is my prayer.

Danielsonville.

☞ Books have multiplied to such an extent in our country, that it now takes 750 paper-mills, with 2000 engines in constant operation, to supply the printers, who work day and night, endeavoring to keep their engagements with publishers. These tireless mills produced 270,000,000 pounds of paper the past year, which immense supply has been sold for about $27,000,000. A pound and a quarter of rags are required for a pound of paper; and 400,000,000 pounds were therefore consumed in this way last year.

☞ He that holds himself in reverence and due esteem, both for the dignity of God's image upon him, and for the price of his redemption, which he thinks is visibly marked upon his forehead, accounts himself both a fit person to do the noblest and godliest deeds, and much better worth than to object and defile, with such a debasement and pollution as sin is, himself so highly ransomed and ennobled, to a new friendship and filial relation with God.—Milton.

Our New Volume.

The Crisis Enlarged and Improved.

With the next number will close the eighth volume of the Crisis. The materials for printing our paper have now been in use more than three years, and, as a consequence, it does not present that neat and mechanical appearance which should characterize a religious paper. The number of our paying subscribers has at no time been large; and taking into account our free list, we have barely made the Crisis, by the strictest economy, sustain itself. Hence, we have never felt justified in making any improvements not warranted by its income.

Desiring, however, to enlarge the bounds of its influence, and introduce it among those who are not familiar with the doctrine it advocates, as well as at the solicitation of many of our brethren and friends, we contemplate enlarging and improving the Crisis, commencing with the first number of volume nine.

It is proposed to give twenty-eight columns, instead of twenty-four as now, increasing their length proportionably, which will make it considerably larger than its present size. We also propose to furnish new type, dress it in an entire new suit, and print it upon a better quality of paper—thus making it in all respects equal to any of our religious journals.

Our readers will see at once that the cost of new materials, the additional expense of mechanical labor, and a larger size and better quality of paper, will proportionably add to the already heavy outlay of issuing the Crisis. The improvements thus suggested cannot be made without the earnest and active aid and co-operation of our brethren and friends everywhere. To accomplish this, and continue the publication of our paper at the present subscription price, we not only require all back arrearages to be paid in, but also large additions of paying subscribers.

In furtherance of this object, therefore, we earnestly call upon all indebted to us to forward the amount immediately, as by so doing we shall be cheered and encouraged in our undertaking, and enter upon the duties of the new volume with renewed vigor and larger hopes.

But this is not all. We call upon our brethren to make earnest efforts to increase the circulation of our paper. In our humble sheet we repudiate the popular theology of the day; assert that the doctrine we advocate is founded upon the Bible and truth. If this assertion be correct, what an incentive we have to arouse to action; to do all that in us lies to spread the light of truth and love throughout our land; to hold up before the world a doctrine in which God can be viewed with affection. The question we now advocate assumes a practical form; and the appeal is made, whether, in love of our doctrine, and in the sincerity of your faith in that doctrine, one fourth of our subscribers will make the effort, and each send in a new name to be added to our list? If our doctrine is true, it is worth spreading, and in what manner can it be so effectually and cheaply done, as by increasing the circulation of our paper? Not for pecuniary reward, but for truth's sake, do we make the appeal. Will you respond to this appeal?

The additional expense of getting new type, better paper and larger size, will be about four hundred dollars for the year. Are there not forty of our subscribers who will give ten dollars each for this important enterprise? If there are not so many who can give ten, let all give what they can. Shall it be done?

Please write immediately, stating what you can give for this object. Let us do the best we can, and make our family paper second to none. Please sit down at once, and drop us a line. Will not our preaching brethren take hold of this work in earnest?

☞ Bethlehem at present contains about two hundred houses, occupied by Christians and Mohammedans. In the eastern part of the village there is a church and convent, beneath which is an underground chapel, lighted by thirty-two lamps, which is said to be the spot where the stable was in which Jesus was born; but that is a matter of doubt.

☞ Language is a solemn thing. It grows out of life,—out of its agonies and ecstasies, its wants and its weariness.—Every language is a temple, in which the soul of those who speak it is enshrined.

☞ A man has sometimes more public than private merit.

For the Crisis.

State of the Cause.

Many are inquiring, how is the work going on? Going as it always did when it goes at all, i. e., when the church feel the need of a reformation sufficient to go to work on the personal effort principle. God owns and blesses their efforts in proportion to this kind of labor. God always did and will approve of our laboring for the salvation of others. A revival in a church is an impossible thing until the church will work. Paul nor Gabriel could preach the blessing down; yet the simple working faith of the church, ever so small, claim it on these conditions.

There is a good work in many places this winter. I will mention some that I have witnessed. New Bedford and East Boston have just taken to working, and God is converting. Portsmouth just commencing to work; God has converted a number, in spite of the opposing influence that believe in and act out a cross, willful, truculent disposition, which has kept them bound for months. Other churches suffer in the same way, and from these same dispositions, in other places. Kennebunkport is trying to rise and go to work in unison. God blessed the first effort this winter, last Sabbath, the 6th. If they will work, they will eat.

I have attended a protracted meeting about six days in the town of Rye, N. H. God is at work in very deed. Bro. Timothy Cole commenced a protracted meeting the first of Feb. with the church. First they had a mind to work, for they went to work and left all other business, and attended three meetings a day. Some came three miles, and many brought their dinners and acted out their faith. As soon as they got into working order, God gave them work to do. Sinners were convicted. As soon as they got strong enough, were converted. The converts came out strong, and went to work for others; and the work has been increasing. I left last evening, the 11th, after witnessing over fifty at the altar for prayers. Many came out into liberty. Probably one hundred have been liberated from the bondage of sin already, in two weeks. This looks like the work of God. Men and women were so convicted, that twenty were crying at once for mercy. Stout hearted men quaked and trembled under the power of God.

There are two other churches in the place, and no opposition. The preachers both attend and help. Bro. Cole thinks of continuing next week. God help him to shake the whole town. Come! God and the world want you all to go to work.

Thoughts on the Seven Last Plagues.

BRO GRANT:—As I have been of the belief for about twelve years that the seven last plagues are yet to come, I thought I would give, with your permission, a few thoughts concerning them.

In Rev. 15th, chapter, we have these plagues brought to view, and we are told in them is filled up the wrath of God; and as they are the last plagues, I suppose they must be fulfilled in the last days. I do not see as the saints suffer in the least by these plagues, at the same time I believe that they will remain on the earth until the pouring out of the sixth vial, and then we shall have seen fulfilled the 91st Psalm. I think the plagues will all be poured out in one prophetic day or literal year.

In the 17th chapter of Rev. we have the woman brought to view on the scarlet beast sitting on many waters. The waters we are told are people, and multitudes, nations, and tongues, and John sees this woman, (in company with one of the angels having the vials,) and she is called mystical Babylon, and the last plagues are to be poured out on the earth where people and nations live; and in the 18th chapter we read that her plagues will come in one day, and I think the last plagues must be the ones that the other angel meant John should understand.

If the sores in Rev. 16: 2–11, are the same sores, it appears that the plagues must follow each other in quick succession.

THOS. L. SALTONSTALL.

☞ It is strange that the experience of so many ages should not make us judge more solidly of the present and of the future, so as to take proper measures in the one for the other. We doat upon this world as if it were never to have an end, and we neglect the next as if it were never to have a beginning.—Fenelon.

Correspondents.

From Bro. Geo. Bliss.

BRO. GRANT:—I should like to say to our brethren and friends through the Crisis, that we are located for the present in the west part of Coventry, (Narrow Lane, so called.) We have none here to sympathize with us in our views respecting the final end of the wicked, and the shortness of time, although we find some warm hearted christians. We desire to be kept by the power of God from the snares and temptations of this wicked world, as we are under severe trials of almost every kind. Satan stands ready to buffet; and unbelief sometimes seems to claim the victory. We earnestly desire the prayers of all God's children, who may read this, that God may look down upon us in mercy. Sometimes we feel, as the Psalmist says, "I am like a pelican of the wilderness. I am like an owl of the desert. I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house top."

We would earnestly invite Bro. Geo. Champlin and Bro. E. Bellows, who are in this town, (although some miles from us.) if they should come this way to call upon us, or any of the brethren who might happen to be near us. And to the brethren in Roxbury we would say, we have not forgotten them, nor their brotherly love, kindness and hospitality which has been shown to us. And we deeply sympathize with Bro. A. J. Maglue in the loss of his beloved wife, and may his deep bereavement be sanctified to him and his little family, and to the church.

To the brethren who enjoy the privileges of which we are deprived, we would say, pray much, and remember the lonely ones of the flock who are struggling against the wind and tide of this uncharitable world. We want to be prepared to live here, and to discharge our obligations to our fellow men, and then we shall be prepared to meet our blessed Lord and Master.

Rev. Mr. Spurgeon is to go to America, but the alleged contract for £10,000 with transatlantic churches is untrue, he having declined the offer.

The Paris Debats thinks there are excellent reasons for trusting in the preservation of general peace.

On the 6th the Patrie had an article to the effect that the avoidance of war is not to be considered certain. This, with false reports of insurrection in Milan and Venice, and a collision between the Austrian and Sardinian troops, caused a reaction on the Bourse and a decline of three-fourths per cent. The following day the market was more steady, closing at a fractional improvement. On the 21st the market opened firm and animated, but subsequently declined and closed flat.

LATEST.

LONDON, Saturday.—The Times City Article quotes the funds heavy and inanimate, and after regular hours experienced a further fall, owing to the statements about the Austrian loan, and the contemplated augmentation of the Navy estimates. A contract for the purchase of the Great Eastern was concluded yesterday; £300,000 has been subscribed, which is thought enough to purchase and complete the ship, and provide a working capital.

The Daily News says Prussia has signified to France that she would look not with indifference but great anxiety on any unprovoked attack on Austria by France.

The Spiritualist's Register for 1859 puts the total of believers in the United States at 1,284,000. It also gives the names and addresses of 349 public speakers and 238 professional mediums.

Obituary Notices.

Died, at Brookfield, Dec. 13th, 1858, Miss LAURA M. PERHAM, aged 20 years.

Sister Perham experienced religion only a short time before her death; but she left a bright evidence of her acceptance with God. The humble, unassuming, virtuous life of Sr. Perham endeared her much to her friends and acquaintances, and also prepared her thus in the morn of life to watch with composure the shades of death as they approached, and bid adieu to dear friends and associations, saying, "Weep not; all his well!"

L. M. HUCKINS.

Died, in Salem, N. H., Dec. 30th, 1858, of scarlet fever, GEORGE W. ROBIE, youngest son of Daniel and Harriet Robie, aged 5 months and 25 days.

May the afflicted be prepared to meet their little one, when Christ the great Life-Giver shall bring it again from the dark grave.

O weep not that his fragile form
Is in the grave so deep,
For George will yet in beauty bloom,
No more in death to sleep.

N. L. ROBIE.

Died, in Kennebunk, Me., Feb. 3d, Bro. EBENEZER GOOCH, aged 74 years.

PRECIOUS FAITH.

[Translated from the German of Count Zinzendorf, "Ich weiss an wen ich glaube."]

I know in whom I trust,
The Holy and the Just;
The Father's image pure and bright,
The Lord of mercy and of might.

I know in whom I trust,
Though yield to death I must,
Thou wilt not leave me in the grave,
But from its dark dominion save.

I know in whom I trust,
When Thou shalt raise the just,
I too shall in thine image shine,
In bliss and purity divine.

Holy and precious Faith!
Thou Conqueror of death!
My present joy, my pledge of bliss,
Lord, evermore my faith increase.

Which; Dead or Alive?

IS THERE A PARADISE IN SHEOL?

BY D. T. TAYLOR.

Heretics are always asking questions about the Bible. And sometimes scholastic lore finds it no easy task to furnish the answers. So it was with Luther. So it was with Latimer. If they had only possessed the grace of silence, how nicely the old scarlet-colored hag might perhaps have been gracing the back of her crimson steed to-day. How quietly and queenly she would have handed around the golden cup. Bless me, if that Luther and his coadjutors had only stopped thinking, and held their tongues, Christendom would probably to this day have been as dark as—Hades. But the bold man would think, and talk, and act as he pleased, and the world is thereby in the condition of a humorous patient who told his physician that he was beginning "to complain of getting better."

Speaking of Hades, brings me back to my subject. If any body got any light from my former letter on this old castle of death, I am glad of it, for I did n't. Unfathomable Sheol! I wonder if there was such a thing as Sheol before our mundane world was created? Think not. Good old Jacob appears to be the first Bible man who ever used the strange term. So Moses says. Three times he tells about his gray hairs going "down to Sheol," and once spoke of "going down himself." Gen. 37: 35, with 42: 38, and 44: 29–31. So it must be down somewhere. This the book amply proves. But what about the aged patriarch's "gray hairs" going into Sheol? I thought that was the place for souls or spirits, while the gray hairs, head and all, rested in kever. Have spirits or souls got gray hairs? Where's Judge Edmonds? I think I begin now to see through it. Israel says, "I will go down to Sheol," &c., and the "I" means his body. But the "I" was to go down "mourning." Do bodies mourn? But the "I" means his soul or spirit. Well, then, of course "my" means the same—the intelligent inside man who "mourned" and "sorrowed." Please now tell us whose "gray hairs" went into Sheol along with the "I"—eh? O, you dolt, you, says one, too ready to sacrifice theology to grammar, Sheol is here used figuratively to denote the grave, as the translators render it. Y-e-a-s. So you think. I wonder, then, if that glorious old man represented by the single, convenient, personal pronoun "I," is really in the grave! Speak, cave of Machpelah! Now I don't say that Sheol is but another name for the tomb, but I do say Jacob talks as though he thought it was. Ah, Jacob, this is a primary use of the term, and you should not have used it figuratively the first time it was ever penned down from your lips, and so leave us Gentiles, three thousand years afterwards, to quarrel over the meaning of your words. Then again, we always thought the primary use of words was the literal usage, and from them we learned the original sense; but, alas! who knows anything in these shifting times?

But they say Paradise is in Sheol. Shades of Job and Jacob! Whose Paradise is it? God's, the fantastical Jews, or Satan's? If there is a Paradise in Sheol for the good, what means all this world-wide ado about the pale horse and his rider? Why nickname the latter the king of terrors? Why did Hezekiah make such a fuss when this king came for him, and beg of God to be excused from going to Paradise? Reader, the other world, like Noah's ark, has only one window,—the Bible. Suppose we take another peep in through it, and, as we gaze, inquire—

1. If some little corner or upper story of Sheol or Hades is really partitioned off by its divine architect into a paradise, why do the inspired writers of the Bible in all the seventy-six places where Sheol and Hades are mentioned by them, fail to inform us of it? Was it not a proper time and place to inform us of the fact, if fact it be, and not leave us to find it out from "old wives' fables" and the notional, whimsical Rabbis?

2. If Paradise is in Hades—with a little tautology we ask—why does the theory (like another) possess the inequality of the lame man's legs, Prov. 26: 7, in not affording even a passage where Sheol and Paradise are spoken of together? Luke 16 mentions Hades, and dead ones in it, but don't mention Paradise. Luke 23: 43, mentions Paradise, but don't put it in Hades, or even name that abode. And it will require a very wise man to prove a paradise in Hades from 2 Cor. 12: 4, and Rev. 2: 7.

3. If it is important for christians to know that one half of Hades, more or less, is a Paradise, and that these incongruous two, to which are assigned the souls or spirits of the dead, are separated by an impassable gulf, why are they, instead of learning this supposed truth from the plain, literal, didactic teachings of our Lord, obliged to infer it from his parabolic teaching, and even then not be informed by the Savior in person, but is left to be told by a dead man in Hades, who a very wise man out of Hades says did n't know anything. Mark, we do not arraign Jesus, but his interpreters.

4. If the Hades of Luke 16 does positively refer to the condition of the truly dead, and good Lazarus while yet dead is "comforted" in that apartment of Hades called Paradise, or Abraham's bosom, (capacious bosom, if this be a narrative of literal facts!) why is it not true that wicked Pharaoh—a second Egyptian vessel of wrath—equally dead, is just as truly and really "comforted," Ezk. 32: 31, while on the other side of the gulf and in grim Sheol?—provided both accounts relate to actual events, and cannot be interpreted as a drama or figure.

5. If one half of Hades is a real Paradise, why do the Scriptures in general represent it as being such a "cruel," (Cant. 8: 6,) grasping (Prov. 27: 20,) and abominable place, where "beauty consumes," (Psa. 49: 14,) and why should it be such "sorrowful" (Psa. 18: 5,) and "painful" (Psa. 116: 3) work for even good men to go there? Are not the just sure of the Edenic portion thereof? Does beauty consume in their bright half of that unseen realm? And where is the text drawing the boundary lines between the two?

6. If Jacob, (Job 17: 13–16) David, (Psa. 30: 1–3) Hezekiah and the Hebrews generally ever imagined that there existed some grand stairway or side-door leading out of Sheol into Paradise, through which there would be easy egress, why did these righteous souls profess themselves so reluctant about going there? Were these "ignorant" (?) saints afraid they would be so afflicted with deadly weakness (Isa. 14: 10) that they would not be able to mount the stairway, or find the door aforesaid, or wrench it open when they had found it? After all, don't it look as though they thought the resurrection was the only gateway and avenue out of the proper Sheol?

7. If there really is a Paradise in Sheol for good dead men to live in from death till the resurrection, (what an idea I have penned!) why should the Bible—blessed be God for the Bible!—always without exceptions speak of Sheol in the aggregate as being a loathsome, detestable, tyrannical power, from which alone through the glorious Life-Giver the just shall at last exultingly escape?

Thou wilt not leave my soul in Sheol!—David.
O Sheol, I will be thy destruction!—Hosea.
O Hades, where is thy victory?—Paul.

8. If the souls of the pious are "with Christ," Phil. 1: 23, "with the Lord," 2 Cor. 5: 8, (I interpret these differently,) in the New Jerusalem, and yet in Hades, pray tell us how and when "the city of the living God" ever got moved out of heaven into the terrestrial abode of the dead, and how and when the dear Lord Jesus ever got back into that old prison where he declared the Father would "not leave his soul," Acts 2: 27, and from which, on a glorious morning, helped of God and the angels, he triumphantly went forth to die no more? Will anybody say Jesus is now in Hades? Will anybody say that Heaven and Hades are all one? Will anybody say the tabernacle of Jehovah is in Hades? Who says it?

9. If there is such an elysium—we can't call it empyrean—in such a place for the good alone, why don't the Bible plainly say so, and not turn faithful Jacob, pious Job, holy David, the saints generally, and even the spotless Jesus, pell-mell together into Hades along with Korah and his company, (Num. 16: 33,) the tyrant of Babylon, (Isa. 14: 9,) strange women, (Prov. 5: 5,) proud Pharaoh and his crew, (Ezek. 32,) all the wicked in general, (Psa. 9: 17) and even weapons of war, (Ezek. 32: 27) and dead sheep in the bargain! (Psa. 49: 14,) and so leave them there without any "wisdom" to pick themselves out of the rubbish, or "knowledge" (Eccl. 9: 10,) to find the path to Paradise? Admit that these texts do not prove a paradise in Sheol, then what do they prove?

10. If 2 Cor. 12: 4 may properly refer to the heavenly Jerusalem—as Rev. 2: 7 most certainly does; if the frequent use of the phrase "to-day" and "this day," in previous Scripture, to indicate the time of making a promise or command, and not the time of fulfilling it, affords a fair and reasonable precedent for, and solution of, Luke 23: 43—why can't the sapient commentators accept the vexed passage in this sense, and not make God and Satan equal share-holders of that ugly domain, by locating Paradise in what is called, by the lexicographers, (Dr. Robinson) "a dreary prison with gates and bars," and what is by inspiration made the realms of the king of terrors; and then, to cap the climax of this absurdity and blasphemy, make the Lord and the Devil "hale fellows well met" in introducing just souls into it! And so practically the popular faith exclaims, "Good Lord and good Devil!" Dr. Edward Young echoes the sentiment of millions, when he styles death "the crown of life—the Prince of Peace!"

I sicken at the thought of such pernicious theology proclaimed from not a few pulpits as the very gospel of God. Paradise—God's paradise—must be a desirable place. I always wanted to go there,—I do still. But how can there be any condition or place truly desirable in death—a divinely inflicted penalty for what God hates—the awful curse for sin? And then, by permission, Death is monarch in Sheol. A paradise in the realm of the king of terrors! Kingly palaces in the depth of the ocean! Grapes at the north pole! Flowers in the crater of Etna! Earth's deadliest curse a blessing! That blight which the whole economy of grace aims to extirpate, made, as some do make it, man's chief good! A man must possess an imagination of ten thousand horse power to ever fancy such notions from God's book. I wonder if we shan't hear pretty soon that the blessed angels of heaven are down in Sheol? If paradise is in such a dismal hole, then where is it not? If there was one there to lighten up the gloom, it might be pleasant to step aboard the King's phantom bark, and glide to the unseen shore.

But did the prophets and apostles and good men love to die? Nay, verily. Jacob saw only gloom in Sheol. Moses would fain tarry a little longer. David exulted when rescued from the gates of death. Job spoke mournfully of dying. Hezekiah wept and pleaded for dear life. Lazarus sprang joyously from the open tomb. Paul's wish in plain English was, I do not desire to die, but to live and see Jesus come. John was envied when supposed to be told he should not taste death, but wait his Lord's return. Peter heard his decease announced in sad silence. Baxter said he hated and abhorred death. Irving styles it an unloved enemy. Chalmers said it was a condition of unnatural violence. All nature flees death's loathsome embrace. Are you in love with it? A truth is true even on the tongue of the devil; and the ancient liar never uttered a greater truth than when he said, "all that a man hath will he give for his life." Is it not rather doubtful, after all, about there being a paradise in Sheol? especially as our Lord, in the only instance where he uses the term, failed to tell us so?

☞ I know of but one Paradise of God, and that is the New Jerusalem, in its metropolitan connection with the times of restitution, or new heavens and new earth. And for the dead to pass its golden portals, there is no escape or avenue for them out of Sheol save by the royal gateway through which came the Master. Amen and amen. Then welcome the First Resurrection!

P. S.—Brethren, there is virtue in the prayer of faith. I am better, but not yet well. Will you still hold me on the altar? D. T. T.

For the Crisis.

More of my Experience.

There are some, even amongst Adventists, who think that too great prominence has been given to the question of the state of the dead, immortality only through Christ, and the destruction of the wicked; and that articles for the papers should more immediately relate to the second coming of our Lord. Now, to my mind, these great truths of divine revelation are so blended and interwoven, that I cannot separate them without impairing each and all of them; and I do believe they are designed to go together.

I am indebted (under God) to the doctrine of life and death for my hearty belief in the literal personal coming of our Lord the second time "without sin (or without a sin offering) unto salvation;" and from the first of my embracing these truths I have, I think, clearly seen that a belief of the Bible truth of life and death has led me as it were naturally and directly into the doctrine of the second advent; without a conversion to the former, I should not believe in the latter so fully as I now do. With my former "Orthodox" belief, I may have assented to the idea of the second coming of Christ, and even of a literal personal coming—indeed, I had some confused ideas on the subject, but somehow it was so mixed up with the immortal soul idea, that it had no definiteness, and but little practical influence. My faith on this point (if faith it might be called) was, as is expressed by a writer,* like "wind at rest," but now it is like "wind in motion." I had some idea about the new earth as the abode of the righteous, for I saw that the Scriptures plainly declare it, but whether the same righteous who did and do now live on this earth, or some other righteous—perhaps angels—I had no settled belief; there was an immateriality about it, in my confused view. I supposed the new earth would be one of the planets, which the saints would sometimes visit; but as for staying and dwelling on terra firma, I did not see it as I now do. I supposed the soul would fly away from "heaven above" on a visit to the new earth, as to other worlds; but it was quite too gross and material to suppose the saints were to have their home on the new earth. But now I see that no other was ever promised.

The promise first made to Abraham was "that he should be the heir of the world." See Rom. 4: 13. And that promise having as yet never been fulfilled, Abraham must in the future inherit the earth—for he has never by inheritance had "so much as to set his foot on;" "yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession and to his seed after him." See Acts 7: 5. If Abraham has (as the popular theory says he has) gone to his inheritance in heaven, I do not see how this promise is to be fulfilled to him and to those who are his seed by faith, for "to Abraham and his seed were the promises made." Gal. 3: 16, and Gal. 3: 29, tell us that, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." But when I see by the Scriptures that Abraham is dead, and that Abraham and all his righteous seed are to be raised from the dead, I can comprehend that the promise is sure to him and to his seed in the future, and all will receive the reward of the inheritance at the coming of our Lord, for we read in Rev. 22: 12,—"Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me," &c.

Just so with the resurrection. It seemed to me to be of little consequence, for why should the soul come back and be imprisoned again in a body! To be sure the resurrection body would be more like a palace than is this mortal body; but, as the soul is in prison here, it did not seem so desirable, after being free, to be imprisoned again even in a palace; to me, it looked more like being free for the soul to be absent from the body; hence, the doctrine of the resurrection had little or no practical influence—indeed, I cared but little about it, and why should I? I hoped at death to fly away and live forever, and if it was freedom to be disencumbered of the body, why should I feel very much interested or desirous to come back into another body! And so it was with most all Bible doctrines—there was an indefiniteness, an immateriality about them. I expected or hoped for an immortality of happiness through Christ, but I had not a hope of immortality itself. I was already immortal; the question with me then was not life or death—it was happiness or misery. Now it is (bless God for it) a question of life or death, to live or not to live. Existence eternal, or eternal non-existence—"to be, or not to be?" that is the question now, and it is like fire shut up in my bones. I want every body to see the glory, the beauty and harmony there is in the Bible view of man's future.

Again. I believed in Christ as fully as I could believe with the belief in an immortal soul; but I did not, could not, the thing with me is impossible, to believe in Christ fully as he is presented in the Scriptures, while I was holding on to the belief of the immortal soul; for instance, I read that he died for our sins—that he was laid away in the sepulchre, where he remained until on the third day he rose from the dead; but did I believe this? No. Could I believe it, and at the same time believe that he went to heaven, or paradise? No. However it may be with others, I frankly confess that with me it is impossible to believe at the same time that he died and that he went to heaven or to paradise. Well, what was my belief? It was this; I believed that his human body died, and that this was all the death there was of Christ—a human body only offered for the sins of the world! True, I was told that his divinity gave an infinite value to his death as an atonement for sin; but I never could see it so—this view never did satisfy me, therefore I adopted the idea that his divinity suffered. I read that "he poured out his soul unto death," that "his soul was made an offering for sin;" but the most that I could admit, with my belief of immortality, was that his soul suffered for our sins, and that this suffering was in fact the satisfaction for sin. Well, then, my belief amounted to this; that the demands of the law required suffering, and that the sufferings of Christ met that demand of the law; therefore the sufferings of Christ were accepted as a satisfaction for sin. My belief now relieves me from the monstrous absurdity that suffering was acceptable to God as an atonement.

I see, as I never could see before, that death (not suffering) was the penalty for sin, although suffering was incident to mortality and death; and it became necessary, as a satisfaction for our sins, that the Lord Jesus Christ should take upon himself the penalty due to our sins—which penalty was death; and now I see that "he poured out his soul unto death"—"his soul was made an offering for sin." But if Christ be not raised, we are told in 1 Cor. 15: 17,—"Your (own) faith is vain," and in verse 18,—"Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished," and in verse 19,—"If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable." Why so? Can't be so if the soul is immortal—for it is gone away to "Heaven above,

Where all is love,"
"And there will be no more sorrow there,"

as the hymn reads.

So we see how the immortal soul theory involves the person who believes it in an inextricable labyrinth of absurdities and contradictions of the Scriptures; and I do not see how it is possible for one to believe in the immortality of the soul, and at the same time believe in Christ according to the Scriptures, and other important truths which are so closely connected with our salvation. Not that I would say that salvation or eternal life is impossible on the immortal soul theory, for God is very merciful to our short sightedness and ignorance; but as regards myself, it does seem to me that the great truths of immortality only through Christ, and those other kindred truths above alluded to, have led me into the position where I now am, as identified with the second advent people; that without this faith, I never should have seen my way clear to come out from the church where I was; and that if I had rejected these doctrines, after having seen them so clearly, I should have greatly sinned, and proved myself "unworthy of everlasting life." Acts 13: 46.

I would not for all this world deliberately reject these truths, or hide them under a bushel; for if ever truth was impressed with a divine conviction by the Holy Spirit on my mind, it is the great truths of immortality or eternal life only through Christ, by a literal resurrection from the dead, and I will add his speedy second coming to consummate the great gospel plan—give eternal life on the new earth to his saints, and destroy the wicked root and branch; and all that is within me says, Praise the Lord that ever I was led to see the truth and to "love his appearing." Charity.

Charity is love;—supreme to God, and universal to man. "Love is the fulfilling of the law." Our Savior says, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first and great commandment. The second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these (two principles) hang all the law and the prophets." "Charity is the bond of perfectness." It is the Queen of the graces and gifts.

"The greatest of these is charity."

1st. Charity, in value and power, is above eloquence, either human or angelic. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." There is scarcely any gift, natural or acquired, which gives to persons such power and influence over the human mind as that of eloquence. Demosthenes and Cicero, those unrivalled orators of ancient time, had an influence and power over their auditors almost unbounded, and their orations are read with the greatest interest to the present day. Calhoun, Adams, Clay, and Webster, of the American Senate, have made the halls of the Capitol in former days to resound with their eloquence on subjects of great national interest, and their influence was felt to the remotest sections of our land and world, and yet survive. What, then, must be the eloquence of an angel with intellect unimpaired, with knowledge almost unlimited, with language uncorrupt, with vocal organs perfect, and voice beautifully modulated and capable of any power! Yet what would all human or angelic eloquence be without charity? It would be a mere jargon of sounds. Like a beautiful and well-toned musical instrument, when played by a novice, or unskillful musician. Such is the Bible in the hands of some pretended expounders; all its beautiful tones and exquisite harmonies are put into the most disagreeable jargon and confusion. Doctrine conflicts with doctrine,—precept with precept,—promise with promise, and no harmonies are brought forth to ravish the ear and mind of man, listening for the melodious voices of God, angels, and inspired men. And all because they are unskillful in the word, and often "wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction," and them who hear them. Love is truly eloquent, and is the foundation of all true eloquence. O. R. Fassett.

"No Time."—We complain that we have "no time." An Indian Chief of the Six Nations, once said a wiser thing than any philosopher. A white man remarked in his hearing, that he had not time enough. Well, replied Red Jacket, gruffly, I suppose you have all there is! He is the wisest and best man who can crowd the most good actions into NOW.—Emerson.

OUR PRAYER.

Savior, still we wait thy coming,
Often sorrowing in tears;
Though we've oft been disappointed,
Yet thy promise quells all fears.

Oft we've listened for thy footsteps,
Hoping that thou wast thus near;
But the sequel comes with sorrow,
Making Eden still more dear.

We remember thy past mercies,
We have proved thy dying love;
Bitter thought! that we should grieve thee,
Holy Spirit! heavenly dove!

Do not, do not let us leave thee,
Though so prone to miss the "road;"
Deal with us as sons and daughters,
Chasten us, and keep us good.

Rome as it Was; Rome as it is Not; Rome as it Is.

BY ELDER S. S. BREWER.

NO. III.

I will now quote from Proctor's History of Italy concerning this period, during which there was no ruling head in Europe. And here, let me state, was the mistake in trying to make one out of the kingdom of Naples, during that period. Let the historian speak.

"From the middle of the thirteenth century the unhappy divisions of faction which raged without principle or object, had the effect of depriving Italian history of all general and determinate connection. For above two hundred years, we shall be at a loss to discover among the numerous states of Italy any moment of common action and union, on which it is possible to rest as an epoch in her annals: we are thrown on a wide and tempestuous sea of endless revolution and bloodshed and crime; and yet these are not the storms of barbarism. The refulgence of intellectual light, the revival of poetry and literature, the dawn and noonday of immortal art, play over the troubled scene in strange contrast with its gloomy horrors; with the atrocities of implacable factions, the din of unceasing want, the appalling silence of domestic tragedy."

Koch in his History of Europe, remarks as follows on this period:

"The numerous republics which had sprung up in Italy, in the 12th and 13th centuries, were torn to pieces by contending factions, and a prey to mutual and incessant hostilities. What contributed to augment the trouble and confusion in that unhappy country was, that, during a long series of years, no emperor had repaired thither in person, or made the smallest attempt to restore the imperial authority in these states."

The Sixth Head.—Says Taylor, in his Manual of History, p. 500:—

"In the midst of the civil and ecclesiastical changes produced by the progress of intelligence, a system of policy for regulating the external relations of states was gradually formed, and attention began to be paid to what was called the balance of power; that is, the arrangement of the European states in such a system, that the weak might be protected from the aggressions of the powerful and the ambitious. This system first began in Italy, which was divided into a number of petty states." Page 512. "The political idea of maintaining a balance of power, which was first formed in Italy, began to spread north of the Alps in consequence of the rapid and overwhelming increase of the Austrian power. Maximilian of Austria, son of the Emperor Frederick the Third, married Mary of Burgundy, A. D. 1477, as has been already related, and in her right obtained possession of the fertile and wealthy province of the Netherlands. His son Philip the Fair was united to Joanna, infanta of Spain, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, whose union had joined the kingdoms of Arragon and Castile. The fruit of Philip's marriage with Joanna was two sons, Charles and Ferdinand; and the elder of these, at the age of sixteen, inherited the crown of Spain and its colonies, in addition to his paternal dominions in the Netherlands. The death of his grandfather Maximilian transmitted to him the Austrian territories and the other dominions of the House of Hapsburgh; and the electors chose him to fill the vacant throne of the empire. Thus Charles the First of Spain and fifth of the empire, possessed greater power than any sovereign that had flourished in Europe since the days of Charlemagne."

A few remarks on the departure of the power of this head. Please turn and read pp. 534, 535 of Taylor's Manual of History. After speaking of the destruction of the Invincible Armada, which blasted the hopes of Spain, he says:

"This glorious success was deservedly regarded, not so much as the triumph of England, as of the Protestant cause throughout Europe. It virtually established the independence of the Dutch, and it raised the courage of the Hugenots in France. It completely destroyed the decisive influence that Spain had acquired in the affairs of Europe. Ever since the shipwreck of the Armada, the Spanish state and people seem to have lost all energy, and sunk into almost hopeless decay."

Thus ended the power of the sixth head, between the 21st and 27th of July, 1558. No break in the chain of succession thus far, as I can find. We will now proceed to find the seventh and last head of the leopard beast.

The Seventh Head. I will now refer you to the Encyclopedia Americana, Vol. 8, pp. 282, 285.

"After the death of Fleury, Jan. 9th, 1743, the cause of Austria triumphed throughout all Europe. England granted new subsidies, and Sardinia received £200,000 in order to support the Queen of Hungary. The states general supplied 6000 auxiliary troops. The French were now driven out of the Upper Palatinate by Prince Charles of Lorraine, and the Bavarians beaten in their own territories a short time before conquered by him. The emperor Charles VII. concluded, therefore, with the Queen of Hungary, a treaty of neutrality, according to her, until a general peace, his hereditary states, and renounced his right of succession to the Austrian territories. After the conclusion of this unfortunate war, Maria Theresa's son, the Archduke Joseph, was chosen Roman King, March 27, 1764, by which means the imperial Queen confirmed her family in the possession of the German Imperial dignity."

I see no break in the chain of evidence, thus far, to disprove that the above are not the seven heads of the leopard beast.

Let me introduce a short item on the departure of the Austrian power. Says Van Rotteck, in his History of the World, speaking of Napoleon:

"In the course of the Austrian war he had annihilated in the most violent manner the temporal power of the pope. . . . Napoleon fell with the impetuosity of a tempest upon the army which was progressing auspiciously. In five days' battle, called with greater truth a five days' campaign, Napoleon, that thunder-bolt of war, shivered the Austrian power."

Thus ended the union of the temporal powers of the imperial governments with the church of Rome. And there is not now, to my mind, any proof in existence that can substantiate the fact that France is an eighth head, more than Austria. After the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo, the pope admitted that he was indebted to the Allies for his restoration, namely, Russia, England, Prussia and Sweden. Yes, to these anti-Catholic powers the pope owes his restoration. I have just as good reason to believe that the restoration of the Bourbon dynasty in 1814 was as legitimate a head as Napoleon the Third.

The Bourbons were expelled in A. D. 1830, during the memorable days of July in that year, and Louis Philippe (Lodovicus, 666—his number.) was made emperor. A true and faithful Romanist. Why not make him a head? Because that would be nine, one too many; and if any one since the days of Joseph of Austria should be chosen, I should select him before either of the Napoleons. He was both an emperor and a devoted subject of Rome, and did many favors for the Pontiff. He is as truthfully and as legitimately a head as either of the Corsicans.

If Napoleon is a head, he is a tenth, and not an eighth. I see no way of escape from these facts. I must confess I was too credulous entirely in embracing the idea concerning Napoleon, after reading an article on the re-establishing of the Napoleonic dynasty. The expression—The uncle that was, The nephew that is, Long live a dead man, is now too vague, on a careful examination, to be entitled to any credit whatever.

The positive testimony of historians, cited above, is too plain to be set aside, concerning this question. I see consistency now in the idea of making all the eight heads Roman heads. The great red dragon had seven heads, and under the seventh head he gave his seat to the beast that rose out of the sea, and then he was not a ruling power.

But, behold! Rome comes up again, an iron, political, ecclesiastical monarchy, an eighth form of Roman government. Here is an eighth and of the seven. See Dan. 2: 43, 44. God declares the iron should exist until he set up the everlasting kingdom. Here is testimony on this point:

"A new and powerful monarchy rose on the ruins of the German empire, that of the Roman pontiffs; which monopolized both spiritual and temporal dominions, and extended its influence over all the kingdoms of Christendom. This supremacy, whose artful and complicated mechanism is still an object of astonishment to the most subtle politicians, was the work of Pope Gregory VII. . . . While occupied with the means of extending his power over the clergy, Gregory did not let slip any opportunity of making encroachments on the authority of princes and sovereigns, which he represented as subordinate to that of the Church and the Pope. As supreme head of the church, he claimed a right of inspection over all kings and their governments. He deemed himself authorized to address admonitions to them, as to the method of ruling their kingdoms; and to demand of them an account of their conduct. By and by, he presumed to listen to the complaints of subjects against their princes, and claimed the right of being a judge or arbiter between them."—Koch.

The Red Dragon made laws for the world under its seven changes or forms of government. I will here introduce some of the great words that the horn hath spoken, or, the Red Beast of Prey, as Prof. Murdock (Syriac) renders it. The following is from Taylor's Manual of History, p. 409, and shows a most striking fulfillment of the words of the Revelator.

"Soon afterward, Gregory VII. cited the emperor to appear before the council at Rome, to answer to the charge of protecting excommunicated bishops, and granting investitures without the sanction of the holy see. Henry, enraged by the insult, and relieved from his anxieties in Germany by a recent victory over the Saxons, resolved to temporize no longer. He assembled a synod at Worms, of the princes and prelates devoted to his cause, and procured sentence of deposition against Gregory, on a charge of simony, murder and atheism.

Gregory was far from being disheartened by the emperor's violence; he assembled a council at Rome, solemnly excommunicated Henry, absolved his subjects in Germany and Italy from their oath of allegiance, deposed several prelates in Germany, France, and Lombardy, and published a series of papal constitutions, in which the claims of the Roman pontiffs to supremacy over all the sovereigns of the earth were asserted in the plainest terms.

The most important of these resolutions, which form the basis of the political system of popery, were—

That the Roman pontiff alone can be called universal.

That he alone has a right to depose bishops.

That his legates have a right to preside over all bishops assembled in a general council.

That the pope can depose absent prelates.

That he alone has a right to use imperial ornaments.

That princes are bound to kiss his feet, and his only.

That he has a right to depose emperors.

That no synod or council summoned without his commission can be called general.

That no book can be called canonical without his authority.

That his sentence can be annulled by none, but that he may annul the decrees of all.

That the Roman church has been, is, and will continue, infallible.

That whoever dissents from the Romish church ceases to be a Catholic christian.

And that subjects may be absolved from their allegiance to wicked princes.

Some cautious prelates advised Gregory not to be too hasty in excommunicating his sovereign; to their remonstrances he made the following memorable reply: 'When Christ trusted his flock to St. Peter, saying, "Feed my sheep," did he except kings? Or when he gave him the power to bind and loose, did he withdraw any one from his visitation? He, therefore, who says that he cannot be bound by the bonds of the church, must confess that he cannot be absolved by it; and he who denies that doctrine, separates himself from Christ and his church.'

Both parties now prepared for war; but all the advantages were on the side of Gregory.

While the papal power increased, that of monarchs declined."

Truly he spoke like a dragon; and he acted like a dragon. The above looks like a fulfillment of Rev. 13: 7.—"And power was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations." He spoke like the Dragon.—Prof. Murdock, on the 11th verse. What a striking resemblance between Rome pagan, and Rome papal; between the seven that were once mistress of the world, and for a time were not, and yet again Rome papal is mistress of the world. Dr. Baird, in a recent lecture in New York, remarked concerning Rome,—

"One is astonished to read in this land of religious liberty, the language of these rules. Take that for example of the bull of Pope Sixtus V. against Henry, King of Navarre. It contains the following assertions: 'The authority given to St. Peter and his successors, by the immense power of the Eternal King, excels all the power of earthly kings and princes. We deprive them and their posterity forever of their dominions and kingdoms. By the authority of these presents, we do absolve and set free all persons, as well jointly as severally, from any such oath and from all allegiance whatever, in regard to dominion, fealty and obedience; and do charge and forbid all and every one of them, that they do not dare to obey them or any of their admonitions, laws and commands.' This bull in the original Latin is before me."

Truly, it is very dragonic! The prophet either meant the prediction for Rome papal, or, in matters of fact, Rome papal has most strikingly filled the mould. If the Revelator intended a duplicate fulfillment of the prophecy, I cannot imagine how we are to discern the legitimate eighth head; for there is such a striking resemblance that I dare not look for any other power in the future; and I find it an impossibility to obtain it in the past history of any other.

For the Crisis.

The Ten-Horned and Two-Horned Beasts.

There are some writers who admit that imperial Rome was the 6th headship or form of Roman government, which form they extend down to the days of Napoleon I., and then assume that his rule was the 7th head. In thus doing, they extend the dragon or imperial form over the entire period allotted by the God of heaven to the dominion of the ten-horned beast, described in verses 1–10 of Rev. 13, in which verses we are informed, definitely, that the dragon (imperial Rome, the 6th headship) gave to the ten horned beast "his power, throne, and great authority"—that he had power "over all kindred, tongues, and nations," which power (thus derived from the 6th headship) was to continue forty-two months. History informs us that this power and authority (including the "eternal city," the former seat of the dragon power) was imparted by imperial Rome, located at Constantinople, to Papal Rome, and was exercised by papal Rome to the close of the last century, being a period of 1260 literal years.

As revelation declares, and history affirms, that papal Rome had the dominion of the earth, and that, too, by the authority of imperial Rome, for this period, I can see no possible ground for the extension of the 6th head, or imperial form, to the days of Napoleon. The facts are against such a conclusion.

Again, if the imperial form could be thus extended, I see not how Napoleon's government, or rule, can be considered another form, or the 7th head, for this reason: his reign was imperial, the same as the 6th form, and, as is claimed by some, was a revival or restoration of the dynasty of the Cæsars; and certain it is, from the history of that wonderful man, such were his ambitious designs, which, if he had accomplished, would have been a continuation of the 6th form to the end of his career. Consequently the imperial form could only have ended with his overthrow, leaving, at that time, the two remaining dynasties, viz.: the 7th and 8th forms in the then future.

In verses 3 and 10, the Revelator speaks of a "wounding of one of his heads," of "killing by a sword," and of "carrying into captivity;" which wounding, killing, and carrying into captivity, was to be inflicted upon the ten-horned beast, and most evidently was fulfilled at the end of the forty-two months, by the hands of Napoleon upon papal Rome. Now by a reference to the last clause of verses 12 and 14, it will be seen that this wounding and killing, of verses 3 and 10, inflicted upon the ten-horned beast, is to be healed—is "to live" again, under and by virtue of the acts of the two-horned beast. Now I see but this alternative; that at or near the close of the last century, the imperial or 6th form must have ended, and was succeeded by another imperial form, called the 7th, under Bonaparte, and that when Bonaparte fell by the hands of the Allies, then was fulfilled the wounding, killing, &c., of verses 3 and 10; which would carry us right back into the events of papal Rome, instead of forward to the Napoleonic dynasty. Hence, my mind has become so confused, as to make apparent light look very much like darkness, which I should be very glad to have dispelled. I am confident that no theory can be correct, which makes one portion of Revelation conflict with another, or with history. Harmony is indispensable to truth.

Christian Character.

What is it to have christian character, but to be like Christ? This all will admit; and as all will also admit that christian character is to be fellowshiped, then there must be a Bible basis or standard. And can we find anything definite on which to rely? Suppose we introduce this text,—"By their fruits ye shall know them." Now the same character that Jesus Christ had, will bring forth the same fruit. If it should not bring as much, it will be the same kind.

In Christ we find a sweet submission to the will of his Father. Secondly, we find him obedient at all times to do the will of his Father. Hence he says, "I come not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me."

Now christian character will develop itself in us, in the same sweet joyful submission and strong desire to obey our Lord and Master. To give constant heed to his sayings, his wishes, his will. Not to think a little deviation from it will do as well. Hence a faith that unites us to Christ, the living vine, makes us one with him, gives us the same mind, the same interest, and brings forth the same fruit. This is the good tree. It brings forth the good fruit. It is known by its fruit. We have the mind, therefore the character of Jesus Christ. His plan of redemption is our plan of redemption. His love for the salvation of men will be ours. He was rich, but for our sakes became poor. Christian character stoops to the wants of the poor, and becomes poor also by making many rich. Jesus Christ gave his life for the world. Christianity walks in the same footsteps, denying self, taking up the cross. Christ's life was spent in going about doing good to all who would receive good at his hands. So with the christian. It is his meat and drink to do good to all. If his brother hunger, he feeds him; if he thirsts, he gives him drink; sick, he visits him. This is the fruit. Can anything be plainer? Who cannot decide christian character?

If these characteristics are visible, with but a partial knowledge of divine revelation, who that has christian character can but fellowship and admire? "By their fruits shall ye know them." To be sure, faith, truth, love, and eternal life as the reward, go together. Hence, the first principle in christianity is the living, saving "one faith." What follows is the fruit.

It is a matter of grief to see many heads so full of Bible truth, with so little good religion or gospel fruit. There is a wrong somewhere. Christian character is wanting where there is no fruit. "Bear ye one another's burthens." The good love to do it; they have ears to hear as well as eyes to see, and a hearty good will which accomplishes the work.

Christ visits all in the administration of blessings. The just and the unjust have the sun and rain. Life eternal is freely offered, and can be had by all. Christianity says, Amen. "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come." Christ has promised to come again the second time, bringing his reward with him to give every man according to his deeds. Real christianity loves this, and responds, Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. And nought but christian character will find a resting place in the kingdom of God. "Therefore be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." "By their fruit shall ye know them."

THE RICH MAN AND THE BEGGAR.

Elder A.—How do you reconcile the case of the rich man and Lazarus with your views of the unconscious state of the dead?

Pilgrim.—I find no difficulty, when carefully read; the greatest trouble I find is to make men stick to the common sense reading of the text, and lay aside tradition.

Pilg.—"And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom.

Eld.—That is the way I always read it.

Pilg.—Do you believe it just as it reads?

Eld.—To be sure I do.

Pilg.—Do you believe that Lazarus died, and was carried?

Eld.—I believe that his body died and his soul was carried.

Pilg.—But there is not one word about soul in the whole subject; why not read it right, just as it stands recorded?

Eld.—I think that it implies the soul was carried.

Pilg.—Your theology requires it, but the Scriptures say that the beggar—that man that lay at the rich man's gate, covered with sores—died, and was carried.

Eld.—Well, I think that it is necessarily implied that it was the soul of the beggar that was carried.

Pilg.—As you have the oversight of our schools, you of course understand the grammar of our English language. What does the conjunction and, in the sentence, "died and was carried," connect? Does it connect died, and was carried?

Eld.—Well, suppose we admit it for argument's sake.

Pilg.—I do not wish to talk for argument's sake. I want to know if the language positively declares that the same beggar that died was carried?

Eld.—Yes, it does.

Pilg.—Now will you tell me whether this Lazarus, that died and was carried by angels to Abraham's bosom, was carried dead, or alive?

Eld.—What do you do with it?

Pilg.—I inquire when it is that the angels come after the saints—the poor in this world, rich in faith, and I learn that it is when Christ comes he sends forth his angels to gather his elect; again, the harvest is the end of the world, the reapers are the angels. Therefore there is no one carried by angels till harvest time. Then they that are his are made alive, and are caught up to meet the Lord in the air; hence none will go or be carried dead to Abraham's bosom.

Eld.—That looks reasonable; but how is it about the rich man being in torment, unless there be consciousness in death?

Pilg.—Who was it that died and was buried? was it not the rich man that fared sumptuously every day, before whose gate the poor man was laid?

Eld.—Yes.

Pilg.—Well, then, was it not the same rich man that died, who lifted up his eyes in hades, who was in torment?

Eld.—Yes; but was not this before the resurrection?

Pilg.—You have admitted that Lazarus could not have been carried till the resurrection, therefore it is certain the rich man could not have seen him there before he got there, neither could he have lifted up his eyes in hades after he was buried there, being dead, till he had come to life again. Thus far all is plain.

Eld.—But what was the object of this illustration, as it seems from your exposition?

Pilg.—It was another means which the Savior used to show the Jews that they were not the heirs to the promise made to Abraham; but, as Paul says, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." 2. That instead of themselves enjoying the felicity of the world to come, they were getting their good things in this life; and when that promise to Abraham and his seed should come, they would be in anguish, while the meek would be "comforted." 3. The Lord endeavors to show them that their unbelief was so great that they would reject him and his doctrine, "though one should be raised from the dead" to declare it.

Eld.—But how could he wish Lazarus to go to his brethren and warn them, lest they came to that place of torment, unless himself had first gone there, and that too while there was yet opportunity for benefitting his brethren?

Pilg.—The Savior, in order to give the Jews an opportunity to condemn themselves, that out of their "own mouths" he might judge them, introduces the judgment scene in these individual cases. The man whom they condemned was seen "comforted," and the one they esteemed, and who in fact was a representative of themselves, was tormented.—"The kingdom of heaven shall be taken from you and given to a people bringing forth the fruits thereof." Here in this judgment scene, presented by these two individuals as then present before them, the rich man first parched—he looks for help; soon he discovers Lazarus and wishes his aid for his own relief, but he is informed that his doom is unalterably fixed, the gulf of separation is impassable. If Lazarus should desire to aid you he cannot, neither can you pass hither; the die is cast forever. Seeing the true state of things, which his blind unbelief had hid from him till then, he earnestly requests that his brethren may be informed of their danger, lest they too should fall as their representative had done. He requests that Lazarus may be sent to them and warn them. But no; "they have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." Nay, father Abraham, if one should rise from the dead, they would believe. This was their language, and this is the language of thousands at the present time. Again comes the reply: "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one should rise from the dead." By this illustration, the way is prepared for them to fill up their cup of iniquity, and accordingly a Lazarus is raised from the grave, or "from the dead," as they desired, and instead of believing, as their representations affirmed, and as themselves, no doubt, had ofttimes declared, they seek to put Lazarus to death, lest this gospel of the kingdom, to all in Christ, might spread, and uproot their haughty schemes of worldly aggrandizement, and blast their cherished hopes of future bliss. "They will not be persuaded, though one rose from the dead."

Eld. In doing away the conscious state of the dead, you have established conscious punishment; for you say that this parable is illustrative of their destiny, and the Bible declares that he, the rich man, was tormented in the flames.

Pilg. That there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when men see their ruined condition, the Scriptures abundantly teach; but instead of its being continuous, it is declared that "they shall drink, they shall swallow down;" and, finally, "they shall be as though they had not been."

The World's Crisis.

MILES GRANT.....EDITOR.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 23, 1859.

Office....167 Hanover street.

Our New Volume.

This is the last No. of the present Vol., and we hope our faithful friends and patrons will remember that we shall need the advance pay more than ever to meet the necessary expenses of new type, better and larger paper. We think the time has come to make an extra effort to spread the great and glorious truths committed to our trust. Doors are opening in all directions to welcome the glad tidings of our coming Savior to set up the righteous kingdom, putting an end to sin and misery and, giving eternal life to as many as have obeyed him. Shall we let these soul stirring truths lie buried in our own bosoms, or shall we publish them to the world and exert all our powers to make them as public as possible? They are worth more than life to us, and would be prized as highly by others should they see and embrace them. Then let us show our love for Jesus and his word by taking hold of this work in earnest. Get your neighbor to read and take the paper. Let each patron resolve to obtain, at least, one new subscriber. It may be easily done. We propose that our enlarged sheet shall contain more reading matter than any other religious paper in the country, from the fact that we allow no advertisements. We also design that it shall not only contain a greater amount of reading, but that which is more important for this generation than can be found in any other periodical of the day. Come, brethren, let us scatter our family paper among all classes, that the light may shine forth to the joy of thousands now walking in darkness. These truths must be laid before the people, and as the Lord has given us a medium, by which, with a little effort, it may be done, we once more, for the truth's sake, entreat the friends of Jesus to improve the opportunity.

To Our Contributors.

We are thankful for the many favors from our interesting and faithful contributors, who have enriched our columns with their pithy articles, and trust they are willing to redouble their efforts to make our paper the most instructive and entertaining known to the religious community. Short, condensed articles are read with the most interest. These are fast times, and but few will stop to read long communications. If the subject requires several articles, let each, as far as possible, be independent of itself. Baptize your productions with prayer, writing only for the glory of God. Do not try to say something great, but good. When our readers rise from the perusal of our paper, we wish them to feel as when they return from a good prayer meeting; and not as when they leave an intellectual entertainment, of some popular lecturer; hence let each visit his closet before he writes, and then dip his pen in the love of God and send us the warm, glowing thoughts, fresh from the humble heart, bounding with ardent zeal to benefit our fallen race, and spread a knowledge of Him to whom we owe all hopes of future happiness and glory.

Way-Side Notes.

We left Wells, Vt., Thursday morning, Feb. 10th, and passed our time very pleasantly, on the way to Albany, in company with Dea. Joslyn from Poultney, and Bro. Richardson, a young convert, who has just started for New Orleans, La. On our way the engine ran off the track, but the good Lord preserved us from all harm. After some delay, we arrived in Albany in season to take the cars for Westfield, Mass., where we found a hearty welcome at the house of Sr. Stocking, widow of the late dear Bro. D. N. Stocking, whose funeral we attended one year since. We found her confined to her bed in company with her youngest daughter; and besides these, another little child in their care was very sick, requiring the closest watch-care to save it from the cold embrace of death. These anxious, sighing ones, over whom the waves of affliction are passing their deep waters, made us long for the time when the inhabitants shall no more say I am sick, and when the poor will be rich inhabitants of the everlasting kingdom.

The next morning we started for the pilgrim's home in Bakersville—Bro. S. G. Mathewson's quiet abode. When we arrived at Plainville, Ct., we found Bro. Gilbert, engineer on the Collinsville R. R., with whom we had a very pleasant visit at the depot. He is one who has counted the cost, and is resolved, in the strength of the Lord, to endure to the end. He kindly conveyed us to Bro. Mathewson's, where we enjoyed a short but delightful visit. From there we were taken by Bro. M—— to see our aged mother, now nearly eighty-six years of age. She is comforted with the blessed hope of the gospel, which is the staff of her declining years. Thank the Lord for a christian mother, and the hope of seeing her in the land of glory.

After visiting my boyhood home, we went to Winsted, and received a hearty greeting from our numerous friends. Lord's day was beautiful, and our meetings, at Camp's Hall, were large and interesting. It was very comforting to see our brethren and sisters assembled from the towns around, and hear their testimony in a most interesting love feast at noon. Many hearts were warm with the love of God, which burst forth in shouts, tears and songs.

In the afternoon, it became necessary to bring in boards and make several extra seats to accommodate the people, and in the evening many had to stand up. The cause of truth is evidently advancing in this place.

Our Bro. have just hired a hall, (Clarke's) near the depot, where they purpose to hold meetings every Lord's day. When preachers are passing near Winsted, they are requested to write to Bro. Ira T. Neal, in season to make an appointment, or to return an answer if they are supplied. We hope the ministers of Christ will see that this flock is fed with meat in due season. May the Lord bless the people in Winsted.

THIS NUMBER completes the present volume of the Crisis. It will be recollected that we omitted one number at the time of the Wilbraham campmeeting last fall; and that the omission was made in favor of the poor, who are not able to pay for the paper; thus making only twenty-five numbers in this volume. We feel anxious to supply those with good reading matter, who are not able to pay anything. If our paying subscribers will be prompt, we hope it will not be necessary to repeat the omission.

EAST BOSTON.—The church in this place are having a refreshing from the presence of the Lord. They have been holding extra meetings, and the result has been blessed. Last Tuesday, six were buried with Christ in baptism, and came out rejoicing. It was a happy time for the obedient ones. Several others intend to follow their worthy example, at the earliest opportunity.

DISCUSSION.—According to arrangement, we are to discuss the subject of Spiritualism with Dr. Danforth, formerly a Methodist preacher, at Newburyport, Mass., evenings of Feb. 22nd, 23d, 24th. Question—"Does the Bible teach that human spirits exist in a conscious state out of the body, and communicate with their friends in this world?"

☞ We are now prepared to supply all orders for the tract—"What is man?"

See book and tract list on third page.

Bro. Jno. F. Cotton's new tract, "The Speechless Guest at the Marriage Feast," will be ready next week. Price 5 cts. each, postage 1 ct. Per hundred, $3.00.

From Bro. D. Butler.

BRO. GRANT:—At a meeting held in Pleasant Valley, Ct., Nov. 8th, 1858, the brethren made choice of our beloved Bro. William Ripley, who has been the means, in the hand of God, of turning many to righteousness, to serve the church in the office of Elder; and Bro. Franklin Oatley as Deacon.

Some remarks being made as to their respective duty officially, it was voted to inquire through the Crisis, the opinion of Bro. Burnham relative to the duty of an Elder and Deacon. DAVID BUTLER.

THE PARADISE-TREE ON THE SCULPTURES OF NINEVAH.—The solution pointed out by the author of "Yahveh Christ," that the "Sacred Tree" of the Ninevite Sculptures is the "Paradise Tree" of oriental tradition, is confirmed by an elaborate work lately put forth at Berlin, by Carl Boetticher, dedicated to the King of Prussia, and also by Sir Henry Rawlinson, the modern father of Assyrian History, in "Rawlinson's Heroditus," the first volume of which is just issued by Murray, London. The Prussian entitles his work "Baum-baltus," or "Tree Worship," as it existed historically in Greece and Rome, in Scandinavia among the old Norseman, in Persia and Upper Assyria at Nineveh, in Egypt and India. Sir Henry Rawlinson emphasizes the same thing.

For the Crisis.

The Symbols.

Are the symbols of Holy Scripture susceptible of apprehension by the believing and obedient? Or are they all a mass of disorder and darkness, and only adapted to derange the good understanding we may have as to other things? Or are they to be applied as varying imagination may dictate, sometimes, for instance, making "the beast" the great political organization of its time, and then again making it a delusive spirit—a senseless mysticism; and no political organization at all? It is painful to see the levity or recklessness with which these loftiest but simplest themes of Revelation are treated.

The symbols of Holy Scripture are the most intelligible forms by which Divine Wisdom would teach mankind. "The four beasts" of Dan. 7 are explained. They symbolize, signify, "FOUR kingdoms that shall arise out of the earth." They are all selfish and satanic, being organized by "the spirit of the power of the air." They are oppressive and destructive—like raging beasts in their sphere. "The fourth" reaches on to "the judgment"—the kingdom of God. Dan. 7: 9–11, 18–27; Rev. 17. They are not, as seen in vision, contemporaneous, but successive. They follow each other like the days of the week, the seasons of the year, or the several dispensations of Divine Grace—Patriarchal, Mosaic and Christian.

Then during the career of any one dynasty, the several symbols embraced as parts or appendages of one beast, express its successive stages, as it advances onward to its destiny. Thus it is with each of these beasts. First, for instance, the fourth is one great resistless power, prevailing in its unity and integrity!

Again, the young and vigorous races that rise, invade the Roman empire, and instead of establishing their own laws, religion and titles of power, they adopt the Roman! Hence they are horns—developments of one and the same Romish system. Further on, "a little horn" arises among these ten horns. Papacy prevails over the nationalized divisions of Rome, through its appointed period, and to "the time of the end." Succession, and not confusion, (of events and times,) is here most plainly taught. But many seem never to be settled as to the precise number or succession of these symbols, though divinely explained, and also historically fulfilled. Rome, the fourth, prevails, until "the judgment sets."

Thus in Revelation. This one beastly power—the 4th and last of Daniel 7th; 8th; 9th; 11th and 17th;—only exhibits its varied aspects as it advances along in its predicted course, towards "the judgment." Hence the symbols of these successive stages of Rome, as they evolve and exhaust in history, are not confused, nor contemporaneous. The dragon, Rome pagan, is succeeded by "the beast" forty-two months; Papal Rome, (though civil and ecclesiastical.) Then one such warring, overpowering beastly system is enough! There is no scripture nor common sense in confounding other symbols of other periods here. All the symbols of earthly dominion, during this period of Rome, apply here, (save that other symbols of other contemporaneous powers, like the Turkish "Locusts," Rev. 9, perform their episodes.) "The two-horned beast" must then succeed the forty-two months, just as the seventh head, (Rev. 17,) follows the sixth. "ONE at a time," brethren, is all that the nature of the case admits.

THIS LAST symbol must signify the prevailing political organization of its time, as really as did the first, else we have no rule or reason in the promises; and all assumed faith is folly!

Note; there was sorcery, satanic subtlety, and deadly delusions, as to philosophy and religion, in old Babylon, and all through the times of the Gentiles, as there are now. The Babylonish political system embodied them all. So now, the Romish symbols embody all the old serpent's arts and influences, as fully as did the Babylonian.

☞ Those who are under the influence of self-love often suppose they have love towards their neighbor, though in reality they have none; but, on the contrary, look upon the neighbor with internal hatred, and with a desire to make him serve them.

☞ It is worthy of notice, that while second thoughts are best in matters of judgment, first thoughts are always to be preferred in matters that relate to morality.—Rush.

For the Crisis.

The Promise to Abraham.

REPLY TO "MARY."

A correspondent of the Crisis asks for an explanation of Heb. 6: 15.—"And so after he (Abraham) had patiently endured, he obtained the promise." By comparing this Scripture with Heb. 11: 13, there seems to be a contradiction, which says; "These all (including Abraham) died in faith, not having received the promises." The promises of God to Abraham may be divided into three classes.

First. The literal promises made to himself: which were fulfilled to him in his life time. Heb. 6: 13–15 is of this class; ". . . . Saying, surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee;" The multiplying referring to the promised seed. See Gen. 12: 7; 15: 18; 17: 1–6, and vs. 15–17. It is said, after he had patiently endured he obtained the promise. He endured the trial of his faith in this promise. It is also said, Rom. 4: 18,—"Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations." The circumstances which caused the trial of his faith in this promise were these; 1. Sarah was barren. Gen. 11: 30. 2. The time from the first promise of a seed, Gen. 12: 7, to its fulfillment, was about twenty-five years. Gen. 21: 1–3. 3. Abraham was one hundred years old, and Sarah ninety, when Isaac was born. Gen. 17: 17. In view of the natural difficulties that stood in the way of the fulfillment of this promise, he might have been tempted to think that God did not intend a literal fulfillment of it, which the following passages intimate. Gen. 15: 2–3. 17: 17–18. This promise was gradually unfolded to his mind; and when the time of its fulfillment drew near, God told him in the most direct and literal terms—"But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee, at this set time in the next year." Gen. 17: 21. After this he could believe in its fulfillment without a doubt. Paul in commenting on this promise, Rom. 4: 17–22, says,—"He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God." The blessing spoken of (Heb. 6: 14,) as a part of this promise, was in a sense fulfilled to him in the gift of this son. He was also blessed in all things.—Gen. 24: 1.

Second. This class of promises, of the literal land to his literal seed, in which Abraham has no part, was fulfilled to his seed.—Gen. 12: 7; 15: 18; Deut. 34: 1–4; Neh. 9: 7–8.

Third. This class of promises was made to Abraham and his faithful seed; the substance of them is contained in the following quotation: "And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." Gen. 13: 14–17, 15: 7, 17: 7–8. These promises are founded upon the promises of the literal land of Canaan, to the literal seed of Abraham: the literal promises are typical of the spiritual, Heb. 3: 16–19; 4: 1–2, and are to be fulfilled in the future.

These promises contain the gospel preached unto Abraham, Gal. 3: 8, and also the promise that he and his seed should be heirs of the world. Rom. 4: 13. All christians are heirs to this promise. Gal. 3: 29. All they which are of the faith of Abraham, are included. Gal. 3: 6–8. The list of worthies named in Heb. 11, beginning with Abel, are included. "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise." v. 39.

Abraham was a prophet.—Gen. 20: 7. Through these promises God revealed to him eternal life, through his seed, (Christ) in the New Earth. See Isa. 65: 17–18; 2. Pet. 3: 13; Rev. 21: 1.

THE TONGUE.—Give your tongue to be governed by wisdom and piety. Let it not be as a thorny bush, pricking and hurting those that are about you—nor altogether a barren tree, yielding nothing; but a fruitful tree, as Solomon calls the tongue of the righteous, "a tree of life to your neighbor." Let your heart be possessed with those two excellent graces, humility and charity, and then with your tongue you will not be in danger of hurting others. It may help you too to the right using and often to the not using of your tongue, to remember that God hath said, "If any man seemeth to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain."

☞ If there be no faith in our words, of what use are they?

For the Crisis.

How Long, O Lord?

This inquiry is not, how long is it to the day of death; for, as I read the word, we are not taught by it to pray for death, but, how long is it to the time of final deliverance of the whole body of Christ? And those that have the Spirit that moved holy men to write the word, know by experience what Paul expressed in Rom. 8: 21; and they are groanings that cannot be uttered; but they are for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body; not our bodies, but the whole "body." Every such heart can and will respond to the Savior—"Behold I come quickly"—"Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Amen. If we never were educated to respond in public when this spirit enters the heart, we shall again say Amen, and Amen.

There are many saying now in our day, how long, O Lord, to the end of these wonders? Things are growing fearful in the church and world. Treachery, covetousness and pride are on the increase, with every other vice, and death is on every hand. When will the wickedness of the wicked come to an end, and the just be established? Are there no tokens by which we can know where we are as to our nearness to home? To my mind, as I read Roman history, together with God's prophecies, we shall soon see the land of promise. Then there will be rest.

The eighth form which is one of the seven, which goeth into perdition, is now in existence. The 17th of Rev. has generally been presented to the church, by Bible expounders, as the history of Rome in its papal state, through its 1260 years of triumph. But the angel says to John, "Come, I will show thee the judgment of the great whore," &c. This chapter shows her judgment position. It is not ecclesiastical and civil power blended, as in Rev. 15. Here the mother of harlots is a mere passenger; she has no reins, no bits, in the mouth of the beast. He carries her at will; though she says, "I sit a queen and am no widow;" but it is here her plagues come.

There is no question in my mind but that the French empire is that beast that is carrying her. This to me is the beast that was, is not, and yet is, and will end in perdition; and will bring the end of Gentile rule, and the time that the saints shall possess the kingdom. Praise the Lord. Amen.

Things are working up to a crisis fast. The end is near. It is now coming on to forty-five years since the council of Vienna met and confirmed what Napoleon I. did in taking away the power or dominion of papacy; and shall we not come to the end of 1335 days, (Dan. 12,) when Daniel will stand in his lot? Are we not almost there? Is not deliverance at hand? Mourning ones, lift up your heads; redemption is near! Amen. Lovers of the world cannot enter into this spirit; they say, where is the promise of his coming? and are putting off the day—to them an evil day.

M. BATCHELOR.

Luther's Prayer for Melancthon.

On a certain occasion a message was sent to Luther to inform him that Melancthon was dying. He at once hastened to his sick bed, and found him presenting the usual premonitory symptoms of death. He mournfully bent over him; and, sobbing, gave utterance to a sorrowful exclamation. It roused Melancthon from his stupor—he looked into the face of Luther, and said, "O, Luther, is this you? Why don't you let me depart in peace?" "We can't spare you yet, Philip," was the reply. And turning round, he threw himself upon his knees, and wrestled with God for his recovery for upwards of an hour. He went from his knees to the bed, and took his friend by the hand. Again he said, "Dear Luther, why don't you let me depart in peace?" "No, no, Philip, we cannot spare you yet," was the reply. He then ordered some soup, and when pressed to take it he declined, again saying, "Dear Luther, why will you not let me go home and be at rest?" "We cannot spare you yet, Philip," was the reply. He then added, "Philip, take this soup, or I will excommunicate you." He took the soup; he commenced to grow better; he soon regained his wonted health, and labored for years after-afterwards, in the cause of the Reformation. And when Luther returned home, he said to his wife with joy, "God gave me my brother Melancthon back in direct answer to prayer."

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in New Britain, (or Kensington,) Conn., Jan. 19th, Sr. Mary Bradley, wife of Bro. Wm. Bradley, aged 47.

Our sister embraced the gospel ten or twelve years since, and has maintained her profession by a godly life, firm unto the end. She leaves two sons, also one little daughter, to mourn her loss. May they look to Jesus and there find a balm for all the wounds the enemy has made. A few remarks were made by the writer from 1 Cor. 15: 21.

John W. Crabtree.

Time's Progress.

Time speeds away—away—away;
Like torrents in a stormy day;
He undermines the stately tower,
Uproots the tree and snaps the flower;
And sweeps from our distracted breast
The friends that loved, the friends that blessed;
And leaves us weeping on the shore,
To which they can return no more.

MEMENTO.

My son, be this thy simple plan;
Serve God, and love thy fellow man;
Forget not in temptation's hour,
That sin lends sorrow double power;
Count life a stage upon thy way,
And follow conscience, come what may;
Alike with heaven and earth sincere,
With hand and brow and bosom clear,
"Fear God—and know no other fear."

He has suffered cheerfully, both for his orthodoxy and his liberality. Foreign News.

St. John's, N. F., Feb. 17.

The Galway steamship Prince Albert, from Galway 5th inst., with Liverpool advices per mail of the 4th and by telegraph of the 5th inst., has arrived at this port.

The political disquietude throughout Europe is increasing.

The steamship city of Manchester left Liverpool for New York on the 2d.

The features of her news were as follows:—Warlike preparations were going forward actively throughout France, but the Ministerial journals were recommended to keep silent on the subject.

It is rumored that the Duke of Malakoff will soon return, and will be succeeded at London by the Duke de Montainbello.

Letters speak of war symptoms being decidedly on the increase. Great anxiety is manifested for the Emperor's speech at the opening of the legislature on the 7th. It is rumored that he is preparing a surprise for the world, and that war is certain.

The Minister of Colonies has decided that the immigration of Africans shall be superceded by that of Chinese.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in New Britain, (or Kensington,) Conn., Jan. 19th, Sr. Mary Bradley, wife of Bro. Wm. Bradley, aged 47.

Our sister embraced the gospel ten or twelve years since, and has maintained her profession by a godly life, firm unto the end. She leaves two sons, also one little daughter, to mourn her loss. May they look to Jesus and there find a balm for all the wounds the enemy has made. A few remarks were made by the writer from 1 Cor. 15: 21.

John W. Crabtree.

Time's Progress.

Time speeds away—away—away;
Like torrents in a stormy day;
He undermines the stately tower,
Uproots the tree and snaps the flower;
And sweeps from our distracted breast
The friends that loved, the friends that blessed;
And leaves us weeping on the shore,
To which they can return no more.

MEMENTO.

My son, be this thy simple plan;
Serve God, and love thy fellow man;
Forget not in temptation's hour,
That sin lends sorrow double power;
Count life a stage upon thy way,
And follow conscience, come what may;
Alike with heaven and earth sincere,
With hand and brow and bosom clear,
"Fear God—and know no other fear."

Evil not Eternal:—Are the Wicked Immortal?

"Here, at least, let us hesitate and suspend our judgment."

Thus said an eminent orthodox divine, respecting the view that those who fail of Eternal Life, fail of Immortality. This is maintained in the late work:

DEBT AND GRACE,
AS RELATED TO THE DOCTRINE OF A FUTURE LIFE.
BY C. F. HUDSON.

Fifth Edition in Press. Price $1.25. 480 pages, 12 mo. Published by Opinions of the Press—mostly from Opponents.

"Moving straight in among some of the most perplexed, solemn, and profound questions of theological concern in our day,—especially those of Retribution, Human Nature, Divine Justice, and Love,—with a bold heart, a firm step, and a learned head, the author will not fail to get a hearing. He has suffered cheerfully, both for his orthodoxy and his liberality. Whatever sectarians and idlers may do, thinkers and scholars will attend to him with respect."—Huntington's Monthly Religious Magazine.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in New Britain, (or Kensington,) Conn., Jan. 19th, Sr. Mary Bradley, wife of Bro. Wm. Bradley, aged 47.

Our sister embraced the gospel ten or twelve years since, and has maintained her profession by a godly life, firm unto the end. She leaves two sons, also one little daughter, to mourn her loss. May they look to Jesus and there find a balm for all the wounds the enemy has made. A few remarks were made by the writer from 1 Cor. 15: 21.

John W. Crabtree.

Time's Progress.

Time speeds away—away—away;
Like torrents in a stormy day;
He undermines the stately tower,
Uproots the tree and snaps the flower,
And sweeps from our distracted breast
The friends that loved, the friends that blessed;
And leaves us weeping on the shore,
To which they can return no more.

MEMENTO.

My son, be this thy simple plan;
Serve God, and love thy fellow man;
Forget not in temptation's hour,
That sin lends sorrow double power;
Count life a stage upon thy way,
And follow conscience, come what may;
Alike with heaven and earth sincere,
With hand and brow and bosom clear,
"Fear God—and know no other fear."

Poetry.

DISCOURAGED, BECAUSE OF THE WAY.

Oh weary, murmuring soul!
Yearning in spirit for the Lord's release,
Impatient for thy pilgrimage to cease,
While yet far from the goal!

This strengthening word of cheer—
A sunbeam, gladdening Earth's lone desert waste,—
"He who believes on me shall not make haste,"
Falls on thy listening ear.

Earth's laborers may repine,
When tardy nightfall lengthens out the day;
Their weary eyes may chide the long delay,—
But, oh my soul, not thine!

They may despond; but thou,
The servant, nay, the child of God, the heir
Of glory everlasting,—shouldst thou wear
Such gloom upon thy brow?

Thy wistful glances trace
The nearer path to heaven which some have trod,—
The path baptized by their tears and blood,
Who ran the martyr's race.

What! couldst thou, fearless, drink
That cup of mortal agony and woe!
'Neath the dread terror of the severing blow,
Would flesh nor spirit shrink?

Presumptuous, sinful thought!
E'en now thou faintest, when thy eager lips
Find sorrow in joy's cup. One hour's eclipse
Of light to thee is fraught

With horror and dismay!
And couldst thou walk serene through death's dark vale?
Would not thy footsteps falter, and thy spirit fail,
Without one gladdening ray!

Nay, leave to God, Allwise,
The ordering of the path. Be thine alone
The earnest care, to walk as he hath shown,
With heaven-directed eyes.

The promise standeth sure!
Seest not the glorious crown hung at the goal!
Fear not! In patient strength possess thy soul;
Firm to the end endure!

For the Crisis.

The Commencement of the Seventy Weeks.

The seventy weeks were to begin when the command went forth to restore and build Jerusalem. At the time they were given, Jerusalem had been desolate, and her people in captivity nearly seventy years. During their captivity in the third year of Belshazzar, Daniel had a vision of the rise of the Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman kingdoms. Time rolled on, and in a few years after, Babylon was overthrown, and Darius the Median took the kingdom.—Dan. 5: 31. Daniel might then have naturally supposed that his vision had begun to be fulfilled, for he says; "In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem."—Dan. 9: 2. And in view of the termination of the captivity, he prays long and fervently for the restoration of Jerusalem, and says;

"While I was speaking in prayer, the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am now come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter and consider the vision. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy."—Dan. 9: 21–24.

That "the vision" he was told to understand and consider, is the vision of the eighth chapter is evident; first, because the vision was then about commencing; for the Medes and Persians had already conquered Babylon, and hence, the angel very properly told him to "consider the vision." And secondly, in the 11th and 12th chapters of Daniel, the vision is explained at length; and Daniel in speaking of it uses these words: "In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia, a thing was revealed unto Daniel, . . . and the thing was true, but the time appointed was LONG: and he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision." The identity of the language used by Daniel and Gabriel, shows that the vision Daniel had explained to him, was the same one Gabriel told him to understand and consider; and so it can only be the vision of the eighth chapter.

Now, as the seventy weeks were given to seal up the commencement of the vision, to find its commencement, we must first find when the seventy weeks began. Said the angel to Daniel, "Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks." Accordingly, soon after, in the first year of Cyrus, a command went forth to this effect; and is thus recorded:

"Now in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, (that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled,) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, and he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, the Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and he hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah: who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel, (he is the God) which is in Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, besides the freewill offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem."—Ezra 1: 1–4.

There is evidence strong and conclusive that the seventy weeks began at this time.

1. Because the seventy weeks were given in answer to Daniel's prayer, made in reference to the ending of the seventy years' captivity, foretold by Jeremiah; and this command of Cyrus was to fulfill this prophecy; for this fact is stated expressly in 2 Chron. 36: 21, 22.

2. The seventy weeks were given to seal up the vision and prophecy; and the vision began with the Medo-Persian kingdom, and the Medo-Persian kingdom began with the reign of Cyrus; therefore the seventy weeks began then. And this view of the commencement of the vision, is confirmed by the explanation of it in chapter 11, as the explanation begins with the reign of Cyrus. Furthermore, the vision is represented in its commencement by a ram with two horns, one higher than the other, and the highest is said to have come up last.—Dan. 8: 3. The first horn representing the Median, and the last or highest, the Persian line of kings. And the Medes and Persians under Cyrus conquered other kingdoms, represented by the ram, "pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before it;" which can only refer to the conquests of Cyrus.

3. The seventy weeks were given a very short time before the reign of Cyrus, and as a command went forth from him restoring the Jews again to their own land, restoring their worship, restoring the gold and silver vessels of the first temple, commanding them to build again the temple, it was, to all intents and purposes, a command to restore and build Jerusalem. And that the city began to be built by virtue of this command, is shown conclusively by Ezra 4: 12 to 6: 14. A complaint is made there by the enemies of the Jews, to the successors of Cyrus, that they were "building Jerusalem; and had set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations;" and by command of the king, the work ceased until the second year of Darius. And on petition of the Jews, (in which they refer to the original command of Cyrus,) which Darius having found among the records of Cyrus, he commanded the Jews to resume their work, and forbid their enemies to molest them.

Again, the prophet Haggai shows that the city had begun to be built, for he says; "In the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month, came the word of the Lord, by Haggai the prophet, unto Zerrubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech the high priest, saying, Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, This people say, The time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built. Then came the word of the Lord by Haggai the prophet, saying, Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses and this house lie waste?"—Chapter 1: 1–4. The chronology of this event is only sixteen years after the command of Cyrus.

4. A command of this kind must have gone forth from Cyrus, to fulfill the prophecy of Isaiah concerning this very thing. And this prophecy seems appropriate to the occasion, and here it is:

"Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things, that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; and spreadeth abroad the earth by myself; that frustrateth the tokens of the liars; and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward; and maketh their knowledge foolish; that confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers; that saith to Jerusalem, thou shalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, ye shall be built; and I will raise up the decayed places thereof: that saith to the deep be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers; that saith of Cyrus, he is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, thou shalt be built; and to the temple, thy foundations shall be laid."—Isa. 44: 24–28.

5. After this command of Cyrus had gone forth, Daniel said he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision; which he could not have understood unless the seventy weeks had begun; for it was by this that he was to understand the matter and consider the vision. And again, he was to "know and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, should be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks;" which he could not have known and understood, unless it went forth at that time, as he died soon after.—See Dan. 12: 13.

These evidences cannot be refuted by Bible testimony; it is outside of the Bible that evidence is sought for to rebut this testimony of God's word. The objection is, that it does not agree with the chronology of "profane history." Well may such a history be called "profane," that denies evidence of this character—a turning away from the truth unto fables. Faith in God's prophetic truth requires us to impeach such profane history as that. And, by the help of God, we make the attempt; and to do it we take the testimony of the Bible, and that of Josephus the Jewish historian.

Turn to Dan. 2: 2–4, and you read the testimony of an angel of God, thus: "And now I will show thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all; and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia. And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he rules: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, for others besides those." In regard to this last king, there can be no dispute but that it was Alexander, the first king of Grecia. But the above prophecy recognizes but five legal kings of Persia before the rise of Alexander. Three kings after Cyrus, and a fourth, that was to be far richer than they all. Josephus informs us who they were. The first, Cyrus; the second, Cambyses; the third, Darius; the fourth, Xerxes; the fifth, Artaxerxes; the latter being the fifth, including Cyrus, or the fourth king after Cyrus.

The Xerxes of Josephus being the Artaxerxes of our Bible, as he locates the same events under Xerxes that are located in Ezra and Nehemiah under Artaxerxes. See Antiquities of the Jews, book 11, ch. 5. And the Artaxerxes of Josephus is the Ahasuerus of Esther; for he locates the history of Esther under him; and he, according to Josephus, was the fourth king after Cyrus. And according to Daniel, the fourth was to be far richer than all his predecessors; and so his riches are noted particularly by Josephus, and in our book of Esther. See ch. 1: 1–8, and Antiq., book 11, chap. 6. Josephus, after giving this history of Esther, under this Artaxerxes or Ahasuerus, devotes a short chapter to events concerning the high priests, without the least intimation that those events were subsequent to the reign of this same king; but on the contrary, that the events occurred during his reign; for in the same chapter he speaks of the general of Artaxerxes' army, without any allusion at all to its being any other king. He finishes this brief record of those events, and says: "About this time it was that Philip king of Macedon was treacherously assaulted and slain at Egea, by Pausanias, the son of Cerastes, who was derived from the family of Orestæ, and his son Alexander succeeded him in the kingdom."—Book 11, chap. 8.

Now, this history of Josephus, in regard to the kings of Medo-Persia, and the rise of Alexander, agrees with the prophecy of Daniel 11: 1–4, and agrees with the Bible history; for those same kings are mentioned in the same order in the Bible. Therefore, as the prophecy and the Bible history, and that of Josephus, do not recognize only five legal kings of Medo-Persia, before the rise of Alexander; the logic of faith requires us to consider any history opposed to this, as indeed, "profane history." And by thus disposing of fabulous kings, the seventy weeks beginning with the reign of Cyrus; the sixty-nine weeks of years may reach to the public manifestation of the Messiah—Jesus the Nazarene.

This view is further confirmed by what Josephus says of "Sanballat;" as he gives a history of this individual, and says he died under the reign of Alexander.—Antiq. book 11: ch. 8, sec. 4. He is also spoken of in Neh. 4: 1, and the chronology of the events, in which he took a prominent part, is given there as B. C. 445. Suppose for instance that he was only thirty years old then, his birth would have been B. C. 470, and dying under the reign of Alexander B. C. 331, his age would have been 139 years; almost double what the Psalmist said; "the days of our years are threescore years and ten," &c. It is not probable that he, Sanballat, lived to such an extreme old age as that; and the evidence which has been presented in reference to the commencement of the seventy weeks, would reduce his age to a proper limit. That he did not live to such an extreme age is evident; because, Josephus represents him as taking an active part in the events of Alexander's reign, a short time before his death. He speaks of him as taking "seven thousand of his subjects," and going to Alexander and acknowledging allegiance to him, which shows that he had not arrived to that age when the natural powers of the mind begin to fail; hence, it shows a great chronological error.

Chronological errors are not anything strange, as chronologists differ widely from each other, and it is not to be wondered at, that their time is ahead of God's Regulator. It would be wisdom in them to regulate their time by His, instead of attempting to regulate His time with theirs, as their time may be too fast, while His does not vary. His time-piece is perfectly adjusted, and all of its movements are perfect, and when its hands indicate the last hour of this world's history, "time will be no longer." We may look at the hands of His clock, but we cannot move them backward or forward: and although we are dependent on other chronological clocks, to determine what time it is by His; it is best not to put too much dependence on them, lest we get mistaken, and leave off work before the time.

That the seventy weeks are weeks of years, is evident from the events mentioned in connection with them: which need not be now particularized. One thing however, may be noted; they were "to seal up the vision and prophecy;" and Daniel, when he said "he understood the thing and had understanding of the vision," said also, "The time appointed was long." As the time appointed was the two thousand three hundred days, they can only be long as symbols of years; and as the seventy weeks are connected with them, it follows that they are of the same character; and as according to the chronology of this world, they have ended a few years ago, (that is, the 2300 days) chronology must be considered incorrect by those who have faith in this symbolic prophecy. That the 69 weeks ended, when Jesus came preaching and saying, "the time is fulfilled," the evidence is clear; and that they began with the reign of Cyrus, the evidence is clearer: and hence, by this evidence it is equally clear that there is an error in chronology, from Cyrus to Jesus the Anointed. The locality of this error the writer has endeavored to point out, by the prophetic history of Persia, Dan. 11: 1–4, and by the history of Josephus. If any more evidence is required, there is more to be introduced of the same sort.

The book of Nehemiah bears unmistakeable evidence of its being written by himself; and chap. 12: 22, reads thus: "The Levites, in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua, were recorded chief of the fathers; also the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian." Now Josephus records, that Jaddua became chief priest just before Alexander's reign, and died soon after his reign was over; hence, "Darius the Persian," whom Nehemiah alluded to, can be none other than the one Alexander conquered: consequently Nehemiah, to have recorded this, must have lived until the reign of Alexander; hence, the same chronological difficulty exists in reference to his age, that does in reference to Sanballat. Josephus tells us that these same persons, mentioned by Nehemiah, were high priests in regular succession. So they were "chief of the fathers," and also chief priests in succession, until the time of Darius and Alexander.

In regard to the number of high priests, there is a singular coincidence with the number of kings, alluded to in Dan. 11: 1–4. Joshua was high priest when Cyrus began his reign, and was succeeded by his son Joachim; and he by his son Eliashib; and he by his son Joiada; and he by his son Johanan; and he by his son Jaddua; who died after the reign of Alexander. Josephus gives this as the order of their succession, which agrees with Nehemiah. Johanan and John is one name; the last being the English, and the first the Hebrew way of pronouncing the same name. Joiada is called in the Septuagint Jodaé; and Josephus calls the same name Judas. According to Josephus, Judas was the son of Eliashib, and the father of John, and the grandfather of Jaddua; which agrees with what is said of Joiada in Neh. 12: 10, 11. So that "Joiada," and "Judas" is the same person. This distinction is necessary to be understood, to see the agreement between Nehemiah and Josephus.

This is all the evidence in the case, which the writer has to present now, in favor of the commencement of the seventy weeks in the first year of the reign of Cyrus. If there are any incorrect statements made by the writer, let any one call attention to them. "Prove all things; and hold fast that which is good." No one should be so sensitive as not to be willing to have their errors exposed.

Pull Them from the Fire.

Where is the man or woman who would think it beneath their dignity to pull from the fire a gold dollar, or an article of clothing, half its value, perchance they saw it come in contact with the devouring element? And yet how unmoved the majority of professed christians are, who see their fellow beings pursuing a course which must land them in the fires of perdition at last, unless the spirit of reform shall be so brought to bear upon them as to rescue them from vice and immorality.

Never did the miseries of fallen humanity open to the philanthropist a more extensive field of labor than at the present age of time. Laborers are wanted. There are those who are now swallowed up in the fires of human passion, and the gratification of sensual desire, who would gladly escape from those haunts of vice, could they find the hand of a friend to guide them, or one who would speak a respectful word to them. Many of them are friendless and homeless, and know not where to fly, should they make good their escape.

Since cold winter commenced, a female discharged from the house of correction, in one of our seaport towns, was found the next morning in an old shed, where she had taken shelter for the night, weeping as if her heart would break. In relating her story, she said she could not bear the thoughts of returning to her former associates and practices, and had chosen to perish rather than do so. Noble girl! the Lord reward her a hundred fold in this life, and in the world to come, eternal life. Suffice it to say, the good people of the town soon saw her well provided for.

Another circumstance I will here insert, copied from one of our daily journals. It is the letter of an unfortunate female of Cincinnati connected with a house of ill fame. One day last week the house was destroyed by fire, in which she perished. The following letter was found among the ruins of the building:

"Home! O, home, magical, all powerful word, home! Oft have I wished for a home—one that I could return to after a long absence, when as now wearied and perplexed with many cares of this cold world. I could find retirement there, and be welcomed by kind friends; be greeted by those I have known in innocent childhood. But, alas! those joys are not for me. I have heard others talk of their pretty homes and aristocratic palaces, but I wish not for these, nor could wish for a proud palace for my home, only for a humble one, yet I have not this. I have never known a kind father's or mother's care—a sister's or a brother's love. These have all been lost to me. My infant steps were not guarded by a mother's hand, or my infant lips taught by a mother's gentle voice to lisp a prayer to God. I am all alone, without a friend in the world; for I have placed an insurmountable barrier between me and all that is good and pure. I can never associate with those that are respected and esteemed. My home is in the vile haunts of the abandoned; my companions are the depraved ones whose voices are ever mingled with oaths. Oft times I have heard others say this is a gay life, with all its hellish excitement and all its would-be luxuriousness, but God has said 'the wages of sin is death.' They do not think that when they come to be poor, forsaken outcasts, without a friend—for when their beauty has failed and their health is gone, even their vile companions will forsake them, and leave them to die in the hospital, and be buried in the Potter's field. It makes me wretched to think that this may soon be my fate.

A few more short years and I will be forgotten by those who now call themselves my friends. There are many who profess to be my friends, but I would give naught for their friendship. Too oft have I seen the look of pity mingled with scorn cast upon me by those who think me far beneath them. They too have often laid their heads upon my breast and swore by the God that gave them life that they loved me; but little do they know how I regarded their oaths. I have met kind and generous men who I have liked very much; yet when I think under what circumstances I have met them, I cannot think of them with a pleasant thought, but remember them with a bitter feeling which makes me miserable. I will soon leave this place, and I hope to find a home where I will be more happy, and will try to forget many, many things, and look upward to put my trust in my Father which is in Heaven, and he will not desert me, although earthly friends may vanish like the dew before the morning sun."

The above is but one of many such circumstances that might be recorded, were facts known. O God! How long shall thy justice slumber? When will it awake to redress the wrongs of injured humanity? When will christian communities so far recover from the intoxication of their own pleasure-seeking, as to be alive to the woes of others, and be willing to lay their own advantage by to seek their neighbor's good? There are many who stand ready to speak of and speculate upon the misfortunes of others, while they are dead to the unholiness of their own hearts! but few to say to the fallen, "there's a balm in Gilead" for you, and a physician there.

Now what shall be done? Here are men women, and children all around us, who are slaves to lust. 1. Let us remember that Christ died for them all. 2. That he lets his Spirit strive with them all. 3. That, as christians, there are duties binding upon us that we owe to them all. Such as carrying to them the word of life, and showing to them that we are their friends. Hide not thine eyes from thine own flesh, is the injunction of Jehovah by the mouth of his prophet. Could we always know the circumstances which have contributed to the downfall of our fellow beings, there are thousands of instances where our sympathies would be enlisted in their behalf.

City and state government, expend thousands of dollars annually for the punishment of offenders. If the same amount was expended in supplying the wants of many such persons, they would not be driven to desperation and crime. In the city of New York, and that right under the eye of christian associations, such as Bible societies, American tract, and missionary societies, thousands of vagrant children, hardly in their teens, are subjected to the vilest practices, for a morsel of bread, and subject to the sneers of some professors of religion, who carry about their person ornaments enough to comfortably clothe twenty such children.

But I forbear saying more upon the subject. I sigh for a world as chaste and pure in principle as this is, gross and selfish, over which custom and prejudice bears no sway, which govern all things here.

Poetry.

DISCOURAGED, BECAUSE OF THE WAY.

Oh weary, murmuring soul!
Yearning in spirit for the Lord's release,
Impatient for thy pilgrimage to cease,
While yet far from the goal!

This strengthening word of cheer—
A sunbeam, gladdening Earth's lone desert waste,—
"He who believes on me shall not make haste,"
Falls on thy listening ear.

Earth's laborers may repine,
When tardy nightfall lengthens out the day;
Their weary eyes may chide the long delay,—
But, oh my soul, not thine!

They may despond; but thou,
The servant, nay, the child of God, the heir
Of glory everlasting,—shouldst thou wear
Such gloom upon thy brow?

Thy wistful glances trace
The nearer path to heaven which some have trod,—
The path baptized by their tears and blood,
Who ran the martyr's race.

What! couldst thou, fearless, drink
That cup of mortal agony and woe!
'Neath the dread terror of the severing blow,
Would flesh nor spirit shrink?

Presumptuous, sinful thought!
E'en now thou faintest, when thy eager lips
Find sorrow in joy's cup. One hour's eclipse
Of light to thee is fraught

With horror and dismay!
And couldst thou walk serene through death's dark vale?
Would not thy footsteps falter, and thy spirit fail,
Without one gladdening ray!

Nay, leave to God, Allwise,
The ordering of the path. Be thine alone
The earnest care, to walk as he hath shown,
With heaven-directed eyes.

The promise standeth sure!
Seest not the glorious crown hung at the goal!
Fear not! In patient strength possess thy soul;
Firm to the end endure!

For the Crisis.

The Commencement of the Seventy Weeks.

The seventy weeks were to begin when the command went forth to restore and build Jerusalem. At the time they were given, Jerusalem had been desolate, and her people in captivity nearly seventy years. During their captivity in the third year of Belshazzar, Daniel had a vision of the rise of the Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman kingdoms. Time rolled on, and in a few years after, Babylon was overthrown, and Darius the Median took the kingdom.—Dan. 5: 31. Daniel might then have naturally supposed that his vision had begun to be fulfilled, for he says; "In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem."—Dan. 9: 2. And in view of the termination of the captivity, he prays long and fervently for the restoration of Jerusalem, and says;

"While I was speaking in prayer, the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am now come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter and consider the vision. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy."—Dan. 9: 21–24.

That "the vision" he was told to understand and consider, is the vision of the eighth chapter is evident; first, because the vision was then about commencing; for the Medes and Persians had already conquered Babylon, and hence, the angel very properly told him to "consider the vision." And secondly, in the 11th and 12th chapters of Daniel, the vision is explained at length; and Daniel in speaking of it uses these words: "In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia, a thing was revealed unto Daniel, . . . and the thing was true, but the time appointed was LONG: and he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision." The identity of the language used by Daniel and Gabriel, shows that the vision Daniel had explained to him, was the same one Gabriel told him to understand and consider; and so it can only be the vision of the eighth chapter.

Now, as the seventy weeks were given to seal up the commencement of the vision, to find its commencement, we must first find when the seventy weeks began. Said the angel to Daniel, "Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks." Accordingly, soon after, in the first year of Cyrus, a command went forth to this effect; and is thus recorded;

"Now in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, (that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled,) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, and he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, the Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and he hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah: who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel, (he is the God) which is in Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, besides the freewill offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem."—Ezra 1: 1–4.

There is evidence strong and conclusive that the seventy weeks began at this time.

1. Because the seventy weeks were given in answer to Daniel's prayer, made in reference to the ending of the seventy years' captivity, foretold by Jeremiah; and this command of Cyrus was to fulfill this prophecy; for this fact is stated expressly in 2 Chron. 36: 21, 22.

2. The seventy weeks were given to seal up the vision and prophecy; and the vision began with the Medo-Persian kingdom, and the Medo-Persian kingdom began with the reign of Cyrus; therefore the seventy weeks began then. And this view of the commencement of the vision, is confirmed by the explanation of it in chapter 11, as the explanation begins with the reign of Cyrus. Furthermore, the vision is represented in its commencement by a ram with two horns, one higher than the other, and the highest is said to have come up last.—Dan. 8: 3. The first horn representing the Median, and the last or highest, the Persian line of kings. And the Medes and Persians under Cyrus conquered other kingdoms, represented by the ram, "pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before it;" which can only refer to the conquests of Cyrus.

3. The seventy weeks were given a very short time before the reign of Cyrus, and as a command went forth from him restoring the Jews again to their own land, restoring their worship, restoring the gold and silver vessels of the first temple, commanding them to build again the temple, it was, to all intents and purposes, a command to restore and build Jerusalem. And that the city began to be built by virtue of this command, is shown conclusively by Ezra 4: 12 to 6: 14. A complaint is made there by the enemies of the Jews, to the successors of Cyrus, that they were "building Jerusalem; and had set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations;" and by command of the king, the work ceased until the second year of Darius. And on petition of the Jews, (in which they refer to the original command of Cyrus,) which Darius having found among the records of Cyrus, he commanded the Jews to resume their work, and forbid their enemies to molest them.

Again, the prophet Haggai shows that the city had begun to be built, for he says; "In the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month, came the word of the Lord, by Haggai the prophet, unto Zerrubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech the high priest, saying, Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, This people say, The time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built. Then came the word of the Lord by Haggai the prophet, saying, Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses and this house lie waste?"—Chapter 1: 1–4. The chronology of this event is only sixteen years after the command of Cyrus.

4. A command of this kind must have gone forth from Cyrus, to fulfill the prophecy of Isaiah concerning this very thing. And this prophecy seems appropriate to the occasion, and here it is:

"Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things, that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; and spreadeth abroad the earth by myself; that frustrateth the tokens of the liars; and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward; and maketh their knowledge foolish; that confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers; that saith to Jerusalem, thou shalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, ye shall be built; and I will raise up the decayed places thereof: that saith to the deep be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers: that saith of Cyrus, he is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, thou shalt be built; and to the temple, thy foundations shall be laid."—Isa. 44: 24–28.

5. After this command of Cyrus had gone forth, Daniel said he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision; which he could not have understood unless the seventy weeks had begun; for it was by this that he was to understand the matter and consider the vision. And again, he was to "know and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, should be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks;" which he could not have known and understood, unless it went forth at that time, as he died soon after.—See Dan. 12: 13.

These evidences cannot be refuted by Bible testimony; it is outside of the Bible that evidence is sought for to rebut this testimony of God's word. The objection is, that it does not agree with the chronology of "profane history." Well may such a history be called "profane," that denies evidence of this character—a turning away from the truth unto fables. Faith in God's prophetic truth requires us to impeach such profane history as that. And, by the help of God, we make the attempt; and to do it we take the testimony of the Bible, and that of Josephus the Jewish historian.

Turn to Dan. 2: 2–4, and you read the testimony of an angel of God, thus: "And now I will show thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all; and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia. And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he rules: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, for others besides those." In regard to this last king, there can be no dispute but that it was Alexander, the first king of Grecia. But the above prophecy recognizes but five legal kings of Persia before the rise of Alexander. Three kings after Cyrus, and a fourth, that was to be far richer than they all. Josephus informs us who they were. The first, Cyrus; the second, Cambyses; the third, Darius; the fourth, Xerxes; the fifth, Artaxerxes; the latter being the fifth, including Cyrus, or the fourth king after Cyrus.

The Xerxes of Josephus being the Artaxerxes of our Bible, as he locates the same events under Xerxes that are located in Ezra and Nehemiah under Artaxerxes. See Antiquities of the Jews, book 11, ch. 5. And the Artaxerxes of Josephus is the Ahasuerus of Esther; for he locates the history of Esther under him; and he, according to Josephus, was the fourth king after Cyrus. And according to Daniel, the fourth was to be far richer than all his predecessors; and so his riches are noted particularly by Josephus, and in our book of Esther. See ch. 1: 1–8, and Antiq., book 11, chap. 6. Josephus, after giving this history of Esther, under this Artaxerxes or Ahasuerus, devotes a short chapter to events concerning the high priests, without the least intimation that those events were subsequent to the reign of this same king; but on the contrary, that the events occurred during his reign; for in the same chapter he speaks of the general of Artaxerxes' army, without any allusion at all to its being any other king. He finishes this brief record of those events, and says: "About this time it was that Philip king of Macedon was treacherously assaulted and slain at Egea, by Pausanias, the son of Cerastes, who was derived from the family of Orestæ, and his son Alexander succeeded him in the kingdom."—Book 11, chap. 8.

Now, this history of Josephus, in regard to the kings of Medo-Persia, and the rise of Alexander, agrees with the prophecy of Daniel 11: 1–4, and agrees with the Bible history; for those same kings are mentioned in the same order in the Bible. Therefore, as the prophecy and the Bible history, and that of Josephus, do not recognize only five legal kings of Medo-Persia, before the rise of Alexander; the logic of faith requires us to consider any history opposed to this, as indeed, "profane history." And by thus disposing of fabulous kings, the seventy weeks beginning with the reign of Cyrus; the sixty-nine weeks of years may reach to the public manifestation of the Messiah—Jesus the Nazarene.

This view is further confirmed by what Josephus says of "Sanballat;" as he gives a history of this individual, and says he died under the reign of Alexander.—Antiq. book 11: ch. 8, sec. 4. He is also spoken of in Neh. 4: 1, and the chronology of the events, in which he took a prominent part, is given there as B. C. 445. Suppose for instance that he was only thirty years old then, his birth would have been B. C. 470, and dying under the reign of Alexander B. C. 331, his age would have been 139 years; almost double what the Psalmist said; "the days of our years are threescore years and ten," &c. It is not probable that he, Sanballat, lived to such an extreme old age as that; and the evidence which has been presented in reference to the commencement of the seventy weeks, would reduce his age to a proper limit. That he did not live to such an extreme age is evident; because, Josephus represents him as taking an active part in the events of Alexander's reign, a short time before his death. He speaks of him as taking "seven thousand of his subjects," and going to Alexander and acknowledging allegiance to him, which shows that he had not arrived to that age when the natural powers of the mind begin to fail; hence, it shows a great chronological error.

Chronological errors are not anything strange, as chronologists differ widely from each other, and it is not to be wondered at, that their time is ahead of God's Regulator. It would be wisdom in them to regulate their time by His, instead of attempting to regulate His time with theirs, as their time may be too fast, while His does not vary. His time-piece is perfectly adjusted, and all of its movements are perfect, and when its hands indicate the last hour of this world's history, "time will be no longer." We may look at the hands of His clock, but we cannot move them backward or forward: and although we are dependent on other chronological clocks, to determine what time it is by His; it is best not to put too much dependence on them, lest we get mistaken, and leave off work before the time.

That the seventy weeks are weeks of years, is evident from the events mentioned in connection with them: which need not be now particularized. One thing however, may be noted; they were "to seal up the vision and prophecy;" and Daniel, when he said "he understood the thing and had understanding of the vision," said also, "The time appointed was long." As the time appointed was the two thousand three hundred days, they can only be long as symbols of years; and as the seventy weeks are connected with them, it follows that they are of the same character; and as according to the chronology of this world, they have ended a few years ago, (that is, the 2300 days) chronology must be considered incorrect by those who have faith in this symbolic prophecy. That the 69 weeks ended, when Jesus came preaching and saying, "the time is fulfilled," the evidence is clear; and that they began with the reign of Cyrus, the evidence is clearer: and hence, by this evidence it is equally clear that there is an error in chronology, from Cyrus to Jesus the Anointed. The locality of this error the writer has endeavored to point out, by the prophetic history of Persia, Dan. 11: 1–4, and by the history of Josephus. If any more evidence is required, there is more to be introduced of the same sort.

The book of Nehemiah bears unmistakeable evidence of its being written by himself; and chap. 12: 22, reads thus: "The Levites, in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua, were recorded chief of the fathers; also the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian." Now Josephus records, that Juddua became chief priest just before Alexander's reign, and died soon after his reign was over; hence, "Darius the Persian," whom Nehemiah alluded to, can be none other than the one Alexander conquered: consequently Nehemiah, to have recorded this, must have lived until the reign of Alexander; hence, the same chronological difficulty exists in reference to his age, that does in reference to Sanballat. Josephus tells us that these same persons, mentioned by Nehemiah, were high priests in regular succession. So they were "chief of the fathers," and also chief priests in succession, until the time of Darius and Alexander.

In regard to the number of high priests, there is a singular coincidence with the number of kings alluded to in Dan. 11: 1–4. Joshua was high priest when Cyrus began his reign, and was succeeded by his son Joachim; and he by his son Eliashib; and he by his son Joiada; and he by his son Johanan; and he by his son Juddua; who died after the reign of Alexander. Josephus gives this as the order of their succession, which agrees with Nehemiah. Johanan and John is one name; the last being the English, and the first the Hebrew way of pronouncing the same name. Joiada is called in the Septuagint Jodaé; and Josephus calls the same name Judas. According to Josephus, Judas was the son of Eliashib, and the father of John, and the grandfather of Jaddua; which agrees with what is said of Joiada in Neh. 12: 10, 11. So that "Joiada," and "Judas" is the same person. This distinction is necessary to be understood, to see the agreement between Nehemiah and Josephus.

This is all the evidence in the case, which the writer has to present now, in favor of the commencement of the seventy weeks in the first year of the reign of Cyrus. If there are any incorrect statements made by the writer, let any one call attention to them. "Prove all things; and hold fast that which is good." No one should be so sensitive as not to be willing to have their errors exposed.

For the Crisis.

Pull Them from the Fire.

Where is the man or woman who would think it beneath their dignity to pull from the fire a gold dollar, or an article of clothing, half its value, perchance they saw it come in contact with the devouring element? And yet how unmoved the majority of professed christians are, who see their fellow beings pursuing a course which must land them in the fires of perdition at last, unless the spirit of reform shall be so brought to bear upon them as to rescue them from vice and immorality.

Never did the miseries of fallen humanity open to the philanthropist a more extensive field of labor than at the present age of time. Laborers are wanted. There are those who are now swallowed up in the fires of human passion, and the gratification of sensual desire, who would gladly escape from those haunts of vice, could they find the hand of a friend to guide them, or one who would speak a respectful word to them. Many of them are friendless and homeless, and know not where to fly, should they make good their escape.

Since cold winter commenced, a female discharged from the house of correction, in one of our seaport towns, was found the next morning in an old shed, where she had taken shelter for the night, weeping as if her heart would break. In relating her story, she said she could not bear the thoughts of returning to her former associates and practices, and had chosen to perish rather than do so. Noble girl! the Lord reward her a hundred fold in this life, and in the world to come, eternal life. Suffice it to say, the good people of the town soon saw her well provided for.

Another circumstance I will here insert, copied from one of our daily journals. It is the letter of an unfortunate female of Cincinnati connected with a house of ill fame. One day last week the house was destroyed by fire, in which she perished. The following letter was found among the ruins of the building:

"Home! O, home, magical, all powerful word, home! Oft have I wished for a home—one that I could return to after a long absence, when as now wearied and perplexed with many cares of this cold world. I could find retirement there, and be welcomed by kind friends; be greeted by those I have known in innocent childhood. But, alas! those joys are not for me. I have heard others talk of their pretty homes and aristocratic palaces, but I wish not for these, nor could wish for a proud palace for my home, only for a humble one, yet I have not this. I have never known a kind father's or mother's care—a sister's or a brother's love. These have all been lost to me. My infant steps were not guarded by a mother's hand, or my infant lips taught by a mother's gentle voice to lisp a prayer to God. I am all alone, without a friend in the world; for I have placed an insurmountable barrier between me and all that is good and pure. I can never associate with those that are respected and esteemed. My home is in the vile haunts of the abandoned; my companions are the depraved ones whose voices are ever mingled with oaths. Oft times I have heard others say this is a gay life, with all its hellish excitement and all its would-be luxuriousness, but God has said 'the wages of sin is death.' They do not think that when they come to be poor, forsaken outcasts, without a friend—for when their beauty has failed and their health is gone, even their vile companions will forsake them, and leave them to die in the hospital, and be buried in the Potter's field. It makes me wretched to think that this may soon be my fate.

A few more short years and I will be forgotten by those who now call themselves my friends. There are many who profess to be my friends, but I would give naught for their friendship. Too oft have I seen the look of pity mingled with scorn cast upon me by those who think me far beneath them. They too have often laid their heads upon my breast and swore by the God that gave them life that they loved me; but little do they know how I regarded their oaths. I have met kind and generous men who I have liked very much; yet when I think under what circumstances I have met them, I cannot think of them with a pleasant thought, but remember them with a bitter feeling which makes me miserable. I will soon leave this place, and I hope to find a home where I will be more happy, and will try to forget many, many things, and look upward to put my trust in my Father which is in Heaven, and he will not desert me, although earthly friends may vanish like the dew before the morning sun."

The above is but one of many such circumstances that might be recorded, were facts known. O God! How long shall thy justice slumber? When will it awake to redress the wrongs of injured humanity? When will christian communities so far recover from the intoxication of their own pleasure-seeking, as to be alive to the woes of others, and be willing to lay their own advantage by to seek their neighbor's good? There are many who stand ready to speak of and speculate upon the misfortunes of others, while they are dead to the unholiness of their own hearts! but few to say to the fallen, "there's a balm in Gilead" for you, and a physician there.

Now what shall be done? Here are men women, and children all around us, who are slaves to lust. 1. Let us remember that Christ died for them all. 2. That he lets his Spirit strive with them all. 3. That, as christians, there are duties binding upon us that we owe to them all. Such as carrying to them the word of life, and showing to them that we are their friends. Hide not thine eyes from thine own flesh, is the injunction of Jehovah by the mouth of his prophet. Could we always know the circumstances which have contributed to the downfall of our fellow beings, there are thousands of instances where our sympathies would be enlisted in their behalf.

City and state government, expend thousands of dollars annually for the punishment of offenders. If the same amount was expended in supplying the wants of many such persons, they would not be driven to desperation and crime. In the city of New York, and that right under the eye of christian associations, such as Bible societies, American tract, and missionary societies, thousands of vagrant children, hardly in their teens, are subjected to the vilest practices, for a morsel of bread, and subject to the sneers of some professors of religion, who carry about their person ornaments enough to comfortably clothe twenty such children.

But I forbear saying more upon the subject. I sigh for a world as chaste and pure in principle as this is, gross and selfish, over which custom and prejudice bears no sway, which govern all things here.

"The Best of all is, God is with us!"

It has been the custom to record the last words of our illustrious men, thereby raising a monument in our hearts to their greatness, or goodness, or both, perhaps, which we regret to say are seldom united in man. The memorable words which head this article were twice uttered by the dying Wesley, after sixty-five years' experience, in which, since the days of Paul, there was no minister who had labored more faithfully and under more untoward circumstances than he. That Wesley was a devoted christian, who shall dispute? And that his walk and conversation were such as to extort admiration from his most strenuous opposers, we have abundance of proof; yet his clear perception of the truths of the Bible were greatly obscured by the dimmed medium of early education and consequent prejudice through which he saw them. Besides, the opaque slime of popery yet lay upon the bright speculum, from which it had recently dragged its hideous carcass. And added to these, his more than childish credulity upon some things made him advance doctrines which he conceived were true, but which his candor, had he lived in our day, would probably have repudiated as strongly as we do. At the time when he took his stand, Episcopacy was very closely fraternizing with its friend of Rome, and her ministers were more anxious about the breed of hounds and horses than the conversion of sinners; and he, taking his life in his hands, prepared to do battle for the Lord. Through many privations and hair-breadth escapes, the God whom he served preserved him to a good old age; and when about to lay aside his armor and refresh himself with his last long sleep, he raised his dying arm in an attitude of triumph, and shouted, "But the best of all is, God is with us!"

Since then, luxury and its demoralizing influence have crept in among those who yet bear the name of their immortal founder; and could the mouldered brain of the dead reformer become conscious of the melancholy change, his sleep would be less sound. It is a wonder to me that, as they believe he is living now and regarding them, they would go on as they sometimes do, lest it should mar the happiness of him for whose memory they affect so much reverence. But he is dead, and happily knows not anything. So long as a church retains its gospel purity, so long will it be subject to persecution; and when it becomes popular with the world, it retrogrades from God. Thus the name of Methodist, which, in its primitive state, was a brand of opprobrium and secular contempt, has now become as popular and fashionable as the aristocratic Episcopalian. Why? Because the holders thereof are become worldly [illegible] proud and intolerant.

[illegible] opposition which Wesley had to con[illegible] with was at no time so great as that [illegible] true Adventists have to bear up [illegible] at the present. Neither had the daunt[illegible] Luther, when he raised his standard of revolt against the monstrous independencies of the papacy, greater obstacles to overcome than we have who defend the doctrine of the unconscious state of the dead, the literal and speedy coming of Jesus Christ, and the destruction of the wicked. [illegible] tin beat down the gilded lath of papal [illegible] ibility and supremacy with [illegible] Spirit; and the paste- [illegible] the bloated giant of [illegible] allow beneath the [illegible] We [illegible] profess [illegible] stand-point, yet [illegible] and consistent of [illegible] denomination of [illegible] Methodist [illegible] univer- [illegible] spiritu- [illegible] charging [illegible] on our [illegible] But [illegible] God [illegible] levelled against our reputation and our life, with the Almighty at our side, it is like

"Marching a bulrush against our breast;"

and the spears and darts of the wicked one are splintered upon the triple armor of our Bible faith. Are we in doubt and darkness,—His word is a lamp to our feet and light unto our path. Are our hands weary and drooping, and our knees trembling,—He will strengthen the hands which hang down, and confirm the feeble knees. Are any groaning under a weight of sin, and laboring to be free,—then hearken to his invitation and promise, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Does the arch-fiend, failing in his "time-enough-yet" deception to lull you into security, endeavor to persuade you that your offences are too numerous and aggravated to be forgiven,—heed him not, for God has said, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Does your faith waver through the desertion of your best beloved and dearest friends, and you are anxious to keep them almost at the expense of a clear conscience,—you must let them go, for Christ says, "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me." Are any in poverty and want,—you are not more unsheltered than He who said, "the foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man has not where to lay his head."

With the blessed assurance that the Lord is on our side, we may learn to defy the most malignant and deadly persecution. And if we lose friends, property and reputation, for the sake of the gospel, we may count them as the dust of the balance when compared with that "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," which awaits the faithful on the coming of their long-looked for and long-prayed for Emmanuel. Yet to have the Almighty with us, we must be not only hearers of the word, but doers also, as it will have the reverse of a saving power if we know all the truths of the Bible and do not live up to them. It is in vain for us to talk religion, if we are strangers to its purifying influence in our hearts; for the amount of our abused light and knowledge will determine the severity and extent of our punishment. He that knoweth the will of God, and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. We may be profoundly read in the Sacred Book, and capable of discussing its darkest points with wondrous perspicuity, and by our eloquence and argument cast out the devils of unbelief; yet if we do not order our ways in strict accordance with the Scriptures, Christ will say in that day—which shall lay bare the heart of every man—"I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." O! if we were alive to the awful importance of improving our time, and the light and talent which is intrusted to our care, how eager would we be to make our calling and election sure. We would find no time for the loud laugh and the jest. Our greatest anxiety would not be for the gathering of money, but bringing sinners to God. Our riches would only be regarded as held in trust for the furtherance of the gospel of Christ, not hoarded up with all the stingy greed of the worldling and the sinner.

The Adventists claim more light than others, and, in consequence, have drawn all eyes upon them. Outside their own ranks they have very few, if any, friends among other denominations of christians. Therefore it behooves them to be perpetually on their guard; for the slightest false step or indiscretion will be magnified to their discredit, and that which would be regarded as a slight offence among others, would be an indelible stain upon our snowy banner. And justly so. Do we not profess to await the speedy and literal coming of our Lord Jesus Christ? That Jesus is holy, and so must be his followers. What dreadful mockery, then, if those who say they are expecting him indulge in jest and laugh, in worldly pleasure, and in pursuit of gain! Those glorious Bible truths which have been revived after so many years of dark obscurity, and are being promulgated by Advent preachers and writers, are listened to with increasing interest and delight. And it is unseemly in a minister to indulge in any word which may create a laugh, when he holds forth upon the dealings and purposes of God toward man. The subject is far too solemn to warrant, at any time, buffoonery or jest. The scorner will laugh, and the seeker after truth turn away sick and disappointed.

If we have more light, let us show it in our acts. Let us be more forbearing and less bigoted than others. Let us be fervent in spirit, patient under tribulation; when we are reviled, revile not again; kind to the oppressed, loving one another, even under reproval, serving God with our whole heart. Then let the world frown, let friends forsake, let hunger pinch, let the wind and the storm beat upon our unsheltered head, let the wicked revile and persecute, let the devil overflood us with his evils, we can raise our heads above the dark, dark wave, and looking up to heaven exclaim with confidence, "The best of all is, GOD IS WITH US!"

Time.

A FEW CONSIDERATIONS.

BY F. H. B.

Having read, no less than three times, what has recently been published on the question of time, it may not be altogether inconsistent for me to express a few thoughts on the subject.

It is supposed, from certain passages of Scripture, that there is a striking analogy between the position occupied by the ancient Israelites, and that maintained by ourselves. Hence, we are often admonished, that we may not fall after the same example of unbelief. Now all this instruction, counsel and reproof is good, and may be necessary under most circumstances; but what connection there is between the disposition manifested by the Israelites in rejecting Jehovah, and desiring to go back into Egypt, and a want of faith in an argument on time, has not yet transpired; and, of course, no such principle can obtain, except with those who regard time, or a belief in time, essential to salvation.

It may be said that time is in the Bible, and that to believe in the Bible we must believe in time. That there is a truth in this remark, is conceded; but is there not quite a difference between believing and understanding the Bible? I claim to believe the Scriptures, but I do not believe every interpretation of them that men may choose to give. It is the privilege of the simple-hearted, yea, the most illiterate, to say, in all confidence, "I believe the Bible to be the word of God," while, indeed, they may understand but very little of it. But we are met at this very point, with the passage so often quoted, "The wise shall understand." This, it is supposed, is sufficient to encourage an investigation of the subject, and justify the most sanguine hopes in every point of time the simple-hearted and inexperienced may choose to specify. But wisdom must be exercised with regard to these matters, and men must not be led on blindly, believing the ipse dixit of all who set themselves up as exponents of prophecy. That it is written, "The wise shall understand," we freely admit, but does it follow, from this declaration, that every notion advanced on this subject is a fulfillment of that passage?

At the present time, there are no less than four theories as it regards the time of the Lord's coming, viz., '59, '60, '64 and '66. Now which of the above is the one, in reference to which it is said, "The wise shall understand?" Who is to determine this matter? Who is capable of going into the merit or merits of these arguments, brought to sustain these various and conflicting conclusions? Who is to investigate the history teaching this subject, or enter this labyrinthian department and discover among its windings or intricacies the important truth? Who? A mere reference to the passage in Dan. 12: 10, does not answer the question. We do not question the word of God; whatever it contains is true; but the question is, which of the time theories is the true one? While there are so many conflicting opinions and doubts hanging about this subject, let no one be over sanguine in his expectations, or reflect on the motive of his brother on account of a want of faith in what may or may not be human speculations. The day to impugn motives, and rank among the foolish virgins those who may not believe in these peculiar arguments on time, is gone by, and farewell to it forever.

In turning, then, our minds to a brief consideration of this subject, we may remark that our disappointments in the past, though they should not produce an unbelief in the word of truth, should, nevertheless, lead us to carefulness, not only in our investigations, but especially in our annunciations. The subject may look clear to us and we may feel confident, but we are admonished by the past to be cautious. I look back to '39, when, for the first time, the voice of the Low Hampton farmer was heard in Massachusetts announcing the coming of the Just One. I listened with attention; the message made an impression on my mind, and I became convinced that the argument was true. The speaker had shown that "Justinian, emperor of Constantinople, (called the dragon,) gave the pope of Rome his power—meaning a code of laws on which his power was established, and which were continued until the French abolished them, when Italy was made a republic in 1798—and his seat, the city of Rome, the capital of the Roman empire—'and great authority;' he made the bishop, or pope, head over all others, both in the Greek as well as the Latin churches."

How easy, if the above were true, that is, if such an event marked the commencement of the 1260 years, to run to 1798, when the French entered Italy, and thence forty-five years to the end. It was this arrangement of the prophetic periods that caused joy and gladness. But defeat and disappointment were to ensue, the bitterness of which is not yet forgotten. From the disappointment experienced, we plainly see that the events of 538 had nothing to do with the commencing terminus of [illegible] periods; the position was erroneous, and must be relinquished. Being [illegible] our expectations, we were led [illegible] ourselves to discover the [illegible] disappointment, and, if possible [illegible]. After searching thoroughly, we came to the conclusion that the events which marked the rise of the little horn was the nationalization of the Catholic Church by the government of the Eastern empire—instead of the kingdoms of Western Europe—and the persecution of dissenters. This event—the nationalization of the Catholic Church—it was believed, took place in A. D. 519; thence, 1335 carried us to the point when we supposed the glorious event would take place; but again we were disappointed. We conclude then, in this instance, that though the above events took place in 519, they were not the events which marked the setting up of the abomination of desolation, otherwise there would have been no mistake.

There is probably no good ground to suppose that the edict of justice published subsequently against the Arians, had anything to do with marking the commencement of any prophetic period. This warfare against the Arians was a part of the proceeding which commenced as early as 519. The emperor in commencing this work of persecution, began with the weakest sects of dissenters, and the Arians being the strongest and most influential were not attacked until the last. The persecution of these sects, however, cannot mark the date of the prophetic periods. Nor can we suppose that the Arians were the peculiar people of God in contradistinction to others. To suppose they were christians simply because they believed the Son was totally and essentially distinct from the Father, that he was the first and noblest of the creation of God, is certainly a very inconclusive argument. Admitting the sentiment they held to be true, did holding an opposite sentiment unchristianize the other sects?

Now it is a fact that the Arians have no more claim to the peculiar appellation of saints, or people of God, than the Nestorians or the Catholics. The majority of those called Catholics, Nestorians, and Arians, were undoubtedly devoted christians. It was their leaders, their bishops, and distinguished men, who acted more like Satan than anything else, of which the history speaks. The Catholics of those days were quite different from the Roman Catholics of modern date; and, although the emperors, and most of the bishops and priests, manifested a persecuting spirit, yet the mass of the people were sincere followers of Christ. This was also true of the Nestorians as a body, the only exceptions being found with the leaders. They were as orthodox in their sentiments as the Arians. "It is observed," says Buck, "to the lasting honor of the Nestorians, that of all the christian societies established in the East, they have been the most careful and successful in avoiding a multitude of superstitious opinions and practices that have infected the Greek and Latin churches."

To attempt to select any one of these sects as christians in contradistinction to the others, because the one may have believed a little more truth, or because of a more perfect understanding with regard to Christ's nature, seems the height of folly. Is it not true that the great error into which men have fallen, in almost every age, is this judging of men's christianity by their religious sentiments? Has it not been productive of more evil than anything else combined? Does not the past, the history of which has been written in blood, answer with a thousand voices, yes! Is this not the very ground upon which the Roman Catholics proceeded against the Waldenses and Vaudois? Has not the same principle led the more modern sects to disfellowship each other, with a sectarianism and bigotry almost unparalleled in the history of the world?

And where, O where will this blind zeal end, if permitted to become rampant? How many societies have been broken up through its influence! How many whose hearts were knit together in love, have been divided and driven asunder, as far as [illegible] evil against which we should guard with more diligence and watchfulness, than this one. It's a fiend in an angel's garb; a traitor in Messiah's camp! That we should be jealous for the truth is right, it is duty. We should seek, not only to understand the truth, but to communicate to others. But all our efforts should be characterised by christian courtesy and kindness, ever realizing that our brethren are as honest as ourselves, and would be equally glad to know the truth. We should always remember, that our brethren do not differ from us any more than we do from them, and that they may be as capable of understanding the truth as ourselves.

A mere difference of opinion with regard to religious matters should not destroy our fellowship for one another. We should ever guard against quite a common evil, that of applying false epithets to those who differ with us, or, allow ourselves to reflect on the motives of others, simply because of a difference of opinion, while they sustain an upright walk with God. To pursue such a course, is disastrous—is ruinous! It is a tree whose fruit is evil, and only evil continually, whose ultimate fate is to be hewn down and cast into the fire. There are no two things more diametrically opposed to each other than this spirit and pure christianity! Should we not then cultivate brotherly love, especially when it is true that we differ with each other to as great an extent as other denominations differ from us?

Thoughts on Temptations.

"Blessed is the man who endureth temptation."

There are times when the soul is peculiarly susceptible to the assaults of the devil. When the blessing of God descends upon the soul, in the baptism of the Spirit, and all is light and peace within, then the thoughts are intently fixed on the subject of redeeming love, and the affections all actively engaged in cherishing Jesus, and faith is so strong that it opens the massive gate that leads into the mysteries of God's salvation; then it is that the temptations which beset us are, as far as effects are concerned, no temptations at all; and it is no work to resist them. But hours will come, when tribulations and temptations come up like a mighty army; when the brain is weary, and perhaps perplexing thoughts are crowding into the soul, and some care or anxiety distracts the mind; then it is that the "tug of war" comes; then "Christian" needs his trustiest weapon, and skill to wield it successfully; then the work of enduring temptation is a work. The army of satan moves forward, and places itself in battle array, and its hellish commander appears with his command, to charge and rush upon the soul of that single Christian, and they are soon in the heat of the battle, enveloped in clouds of dust and smoke, and nothing is known of the prospects of the battle but the clang of the steel, the thundering of the captains and the shouting of that Christian. He is alone, fighting that host of malignant foes; pray for him.

How will the battle terminate? Will he be slain? The sound of the battle has died away, the cloud is lifted. Behold, and wonder at the results! The christian is still living, while the ground is covered with slain foes. How is that? Oh! we have it; he was not alone, as we thought; the Lord, strong and mighty; the Lord, mighty in battle—he came down, and clothed him with strength, and he conquered; and now, weary from the battle, he is standing, leaning against the cross erected there, and as he gazes out upon the slain, his heart leaps for joy, and he shouts VICTORY, with a triumphant soul, while a glorious light is shining about him.

"Blessed," indeed, "is the man who endureth temptation," for he shall, when he is tried, receive a crown of life, and live to see his foes slain, and shall reign with Christ forever. Glory to God! The battle is fought; the victory is won! O, how blessed!

Tempted christian, in this your hour of fierce conflict, look up, and behold the light shining about you; gird on your sword, and fight with a spirit determined to conquer, and VICTORY IS YOURS.

HO TIS.

A HEAVENLY HOUSE.—I once met with an aged colored woman who, in giving me the history of her humble life, mentioned the following circumstance: "We lived a good while in the family of Dr. Livingston of New Brunswick. Oh, that was a good time for old Joe and I. That was a heavenly house—worship every morning and evening, and always called in." Such was Aunt Betty's idea of "a heavenly house," and she was not very wide of the mark; where God is worshiped "every morning and evening," and the humblest members of the family are always called in.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 13.

MY DEAR SISTER,—There is a class of "Perfectionists," who claim to be not only saved from sin, but also from all liability to sin. Having once attained to entire sanctification, they remain permanently, yea, eternally sanctified. In proof of their position they quote the language of the apostle John: "Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him. He that committeth sin, is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.... Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."—"We know that whosoever is born of God, sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God, keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not."

We are not familiar with the arguments of this class of religionists, and therefore are not prepared to give, nor to refute them. We know that they lay an undue stress upon the expression "cannot sin," when they consider it as teaching the impossibility of a sanctified soul's falling into sin. God cannot lie, i. e., he cannot consistently with his character—it is contrary to his purity—it would be in direct violation of his holiness. Adam and Eve, though in a perfectly sinless state, fell from it into a condition of depravity and condemnation. The exhortations to watchfulness and prayerfulness, lest we fall into temptation; to take heed, lest we come short of the promised rest; lest we fall; lest any man take our crown; afford evidences of danger to those who are not watchful unto prayer. The apostle John writes precious truths to his "beloved," that they may not sin; but knowing the weakness and infirmities of poor human nature, he adds for their encouragement, if by any means they yield to temptation, that if they sin, they have an advocate with the Father, who is the propitiation for their sins.

In the verses we have quoted, the apostle most plainly contrasts the character of those who abide in Christ, and those who are out of him. The one is a righteous character, sinning not, the other is an unrighteous character, showing by his sinful [illegible] and not of God. [illegible] acts that he is of the devil, [illegible] God. While the "seed" which is "incorruptible," and by which the person is "born again," "remaineth in him;" while the "word of God" is cherished in his heart, he will "grow thereby," and have power to resist the wiles of Satan. Says David—"Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." The "word of God" hid in the heart, is a sure preservative against sin. It is the "sword of the Spirit," and "faith" in that word constitutes the successful "shield" of the christian's armor. It can quench every fiery dart of the enemy. When Satan tempted Christ in the wilderness, he found the "word of God" to be sharper than any "two-edged sword," and while with "faith" he wielded it, all of Satan's darts were rendered powerless. Thus must every christian overcome.

There can be no such thing as [illegible] one grand struggle against sin, [illegible] then the eternal victory be gained. There is no such thing as having one fearful contest with Satan, and then be forever free from his temptations. For forty days was Jesus tempted, and then Satan only left him "for a season." The injunction of the Savior, "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation," and of the apostle, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed, lest he fall," would be inapplicable to those who were saved from all liability to yield to temptation, and thereby fall from their christian position. The exhortation to "beware lest we also be led away by the error of the wicked," and to "fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of us should seem to come short of it," belongs not to such. If the good apostle Paul deemed it necessary for him to keep his body under, and bring it into subjection to Christ, lest, after having preached to others, he himself should be a cast-away, we surely have need, even after attaining to the highest degree of christian perfection available here; to "watch and pray" to "take heed," and to "fear," lest we, after all, "forsake the right way," and thus another take our crown.

May God lead you speedily, my sister, into the possession of a "pure heart," and grant you that "establishing grace," which is essential to give permanency to christian experience, and may you be kept by the power of God through faith unto eternal salvation. Your sincere friend,

"The Best of all is, God is with us!"

It has been the custom to record the last words of our illustrious men, thereby raising a monument in our hearts to their greatness, or goodness, or both, perhaps, which we regret to say are seldom united in man. The memorable words which head this article were twice uttered by the dying Wesley, after sixty-five years' experience, in which, since the days of Paul, there was no minister w[ho] had labored more faithfully and un[der] more untoward circumstances than [he]. That Wesley was a devoted christia[n], who shall dispute? And that his wal[k] and conversation were such as to extort a[dm]iration from his most strenuous opposers, we have abundance of proof; yet his clear perception of the truths of the Bible [we]re greatly obscured by the dimmed me[dium] of early education and consequent [p]rejudice through which he saw them. Be[sides], the opaque slime of popery yet lay u[pon] the bright speculum, from which it h[ad] so recently dragged its hideous carca[ss]. And added to these, his more than chi[ldlike] credulity upon some things made him [a]dvance doctrines which he conceived w[ere true], but which his candor, had he l[ived] in our day, would probably have rep[udi]ated as strongly as we do. At the time when he took his stand, Episcopacy wa[s] very closely fraternizing with its friend [o]f Rome, and her ministers were more a[n]xious about the breed of hounds and hor[se]s than the conversion of sinners; and he, [t]aking his life in his hands, prepared [to] do battle for the Lord. Through [many] privations and hair-breadth escapes, the God whom he served preserved him to a good old age; and when about to lay aside his armor and refresh himself with his last long sleep, he raised his dying arm in an attitude of triumph, and shouted, "But the best of all is, God is with us!"

Since then, luxury and its demoralizing influence have crept in among those who yet bear the name of their immortal founder; and could the mouldered brain of the dead reformer become conscious of the melancholy change, his sleep would be less sound. It is a wonder to me that, as they believe he is living now and regarding them, they would go on as they sometimes do, lest it should mar the happiness of him for whose memory they affect so much reverence. But he is dead, and happily knows not anything. So long as a church retains its gospel purity, so long will it be subject to persecution; and when it becomes popular with the world, it retrogrades from God. Thus the name of Methodist, which, [in] its primitive state, was a brand of op[pr]obrium and secular contempt, has now [bec]ome as popular and fashionable as the [aristo]cratic Episcopalian. Why? Because [the] holders thereof are become worldly [[illegible]] proud and intolerant.

[The] opposition which Wesley had to [con]tend with was at no time so great as [th]at wh[i]ch true Adventists have to bear up a[gainst] at the present. Neither had the daunt[less] Luther, when he raised his standard o[f re]volt against the monstrous independencies [of] the papacy, greater obstacles to overcom[e] than we have who defend the doctrin[e of] the unconscious state of the dead, [the] literal and speedy coming of Jesus C[hrist], and the destruction of the wicked. [Lu]tin beat down the gilded lath of papal [infal]libility and supremacy with the swor[d of th]e Spirit; and the pasteboard mor[[illegible]] the bloated giant of [su]perstition s[[illegible]] hollow beneath th[[illegible]]d blows of th[[illegible]] promising G[[illegible]]. We have for op[[illegible]] those [[illegible]] profess to take the[[illegible]] stand-point, yet [[illegible]] and consistent of [[illegible]] the mo[[illegible]] every denomination of its doctrines [[illegible]] episcopal, methodist christians, p[[illegible]] unitarian, universalist, and baptist, [[illegible]] hoards of spiritualists, and of [[illegible]] vast charging [[illegible]]alism, have [[illegible]] down upon our squadron, and a[[illegible]] phalanx. But small but firmly [[illegible]] best of all is, God [[illegible]] we care not, for [[illegible]] is with us!"

With such an a[[illegible]] what have we to fear? Were cal[[illegible]] vituperation, [[illegible]] sharp weapons, [[illegible]] words as levelled against our reputation and our life, with the Almighty at our side, it is like and the spears and darts of the wicked one are splintered upon the triple armor of our Bible faith. Are we in doubt and darkness,—His word is a lamp to our feet and light unto our path. Are our hands weary and drooping, and our knees trembling,—He will strengthen the hands which hang down, and confirm the feeble knees. Are any groaning under a weight of sin, and laboring to be free,—then hearken to his invitation and promise, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Does the arch-fiend, failing in his "time-enough-yet" deception to lull you into security, endeavor to persuade you that your offences are too numerous and aggravated to be forgiven,—heed him not, for God has said, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Does your faith waver through the desertion of your best beloved and dearest friends, and you are anxious to keep them almost at the expense of a clear conscience,—you must let them go, for Christ says, "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me." Are any in poverty and want,—you are not more unsheltered than He who said, "the foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man has not where to lay his head."

"Manning a bulrush against our breast;"

With the blessed assurance that the Lord is on our side, we may learn to defy the most malignant and deadly persecution. And if we lose friends, property and reputation, for the sake of the gospel, we may count them as the dust of the balance when compared with that "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," which awaits the faithful on the coming of their long-looked for and long-prayed for Emmanuel. Yet to have the Almighty with us, we must be not only hearers of the word, but doers also, as it will have the reverse of a saving power if we know all the truths of the Bible and do not live up to them. It is in vain for us to talk religion, if we are strangers to its purifying influence in our hearts; for the amount of our abused light and knowledge will determine the severity and extent of our punishment. He that knoweth the will of God, and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. We may be profoundly read in the Sacred Book, and capable of discussing its darkest points with wondrous perspicuity, and by our eloquence and argument cast out the devils of unbelief; yet if we do not order our ways in strict accordance with the Scriptures, Christ will say in that day—which shall lay bare the heart of every man—"I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." O! if we were alive to the awful importance of improving our time, and the light and talent which is intrusted to our care, how eager would we be to make our calling and election sure. We would find no time for the loud laugh and the jest. Our greatest anxiety would not be for the gathering of money, but bringing sinners to God. Our riches would only be regarded as held in trust for the furtherance of the gospel of Christ, not hoarded up with all the stingy greed of the worldling and the sinner.

The Adventists claim more light than others, and, in consequence, have drawn all eyes upon them. Outside their own ranks they have very few, if any, friends among other denominations of christians. Therefore it behooves them to be perpetually on their guard; for the slightest false step or indiscretion will be magnified to their discredit, and that which would be regarded as a slight offence among others, would be an indelible stain upon our snowy banner. And justly so. Do we not profess to await the speedy and literal coming of our Lord Jesus Christ? That Jesus is holy, and so must be his followers. What dreadful mockery, then, if those who say they are expecting him indulge in jest and laugh, in worldly pleasure, and in pursuit of gain! Those glorious Bible truths which have been revived after so many years of dark obscurity, and are being promulgated by Advent preachers and writers, are listened to with increasing interest and delight. And it is unseemly in a minister to indulge in any word which may create a laugh, when he holds forth upon the dealings and purposes of God toward man. The subject is far too solemn to warrant, at any time, buffoonery or jest. The scorner will laugh, and the seeker after truth turn away sick and disappointed.

If we have more light, let us show it in our acts. Let us be more forbearing and less bigoted than others. Let us be fervent in spirit, patient under tribulation; when we are reviled, revile not again; kind to the oppressed, loving one another, even under reproval, serving God with our whole heart. Then let the world frown, let friends forsake, let hunger pinch, let the wind and the storm beat upon our unsheltered head, let the wicked revile and persecute, let the devil overflood us with his evils, we can raise our heads above the dark, dark wave, and looking up to heaven exclaim with confidence, "The best of all is, GOD IS WITH US!"

Time.

A FEW CONSIDERATIONS.

BY F. H. B.

Having read, no less than three tim[es], what has recently been published o[n the] question of time, it may not be [[illegible]] altogether inconsistent for me to expr[ess a] few thoughts on the subject.

It is supposed, from certain passages of Scripture, that there is a striking analogy between the position occupied by the ancient Israelites, and that maintained by ourselves. Hence, we are often admonished that we may not fall after the same example of unbelief. Now all this instruction, counsel and reproof is good, and may be necessary under most circumstances; but what connection there is between the disposition manifested by the Israelites in rejecting Jehovah, and desiring to go back into Egypt, and a want of faith in an argument on time, has not yet transpired; and, of course, no such principle can obtain, except with those who regard time, or a belief in time, essential to salvation.

It may be said that time is in the Bible, and that to believe in the Bible we must believe in time. That there is a truth in this remark, is conceded; but is there not quite a difference between believing and understanding the Bible? I claim to believe the Scriptures, but I do not believe every interpretation of them that men may choose to give. It is the privilege of the simple-hearted, yea, the most illiterate, to say, in all confidence, "I believe the Bible to be the word of God," while, indeed, they may understand but very little of it. But we are met at this very point, with the passage so often quoted, "The wise shall understand." This, it is supposed, is sufficient to encourage an investigation of the subject, and justify the most sanguine hopes in every point of time the simple-hearted and inexperienced may choose to specify. But wisdom must be exercised with regard to these matters, and men must not be led on blindly, believing the ipse dixit of all who set themselves up as exponents of prophecy. That it is written, "The wise shall understand," we freely admit, but does it follow, from this declaration, that every notion advanced on this subject is a fulfillment of that passage?

At the present time, there are no less than four theories as it regards the time of the Lord's coming, viz., '59, '60, '64 and '66. Now which of the above is the one, in reference to which it is said, "The wise shall understand?" Who is to determine this matter? Who is capable of going into the merit or merits of these arguments, brought to sustain these various and conflicting conclusions? Who is to investigate the history teaching this subject, or enter this labyrinthian department and discover among its windings or intricacies the important truth? Who? A mere reference to the passage in Dan. 12: 10, does not answer the question. We do not question the word of God; whatever it contains is true; but the question is, which of the time theories is the true one? While there are so many conflicting opinions and doubts hanging about this subject, let no one be over sanguine in his expectations, or reflect on the motive of his brother on account of a want of faith in what may or may not be human speculations. The day to impugn motives, and rank among the foolish virgins those who may not believe in these peculiar arguments on time, is gone by, and farewell to it forever.

In turning, then, our minds to a brief consideration of this subject, we may remark that our disappointments in the past, though they should not produce an unbelief in the word of truth, should, nevertheless, lead us to carefulness, not only in our investigations, but especially in our annunciations. The subject may look clear to us and we may feel confident, but we are admonished by the past to be cautious. I look back to '39, when, for the first time, the voice of the Low Hampton farmer was heard in Massachusetts announcing the coming of the Just One. I listened with attention; the message made an impression on my mind, and I became convinced that the argument was true. The speaker had shown that "Justinian, emperor of Constantinople, (called the dragon,) gave the pope of Rome his power—meaning a code of laws on which his power was establi[shed], and which were continued until the Fr[ench] abolished them, when Italy was made [a re]public in 1798—and hi[[illegible]] the city Rome, the capital of the Roman empire—'and great authority;' he made the bishop, or pope, head over all others, both in the Greek as well as the Latin churches."

How easy, if the above were true, that is, if such an event marked the commencement of the 1260 years, to run to 1798, when the French entered Italy, and thence forty-five years to the end. It was this arrangement of the prophetic periods that caused joy and gladness. But defeat and disappointment were to ensue, the bitterness of which is not yet forgotten. From the disappointment experienced, we plainly see that th[e even]ts of 538 had nothing to do wi[th th]e commencing terminus of [the peri]ods; the position was er[roneous, and must] be relinquished. Being [disappointed in our e]xpectations, we were led [to examine ou]rselves to discover the [cause of our disa]ppointment, and, if possi[ble, the remedy]. After searching thoroughly, [we ca]me to the conclusion that the events which marked the rise of the little horn was the nationalization of the Catholic Church by the government of the Eastern empire—instead of the kingdoms of Western Europe—and the persecution of dissenters. This event—the nationalization of the Catholic Church—it was believed, took place in A. D. 519; thence, 1335 carried us to the point when we supposed the glorious event would take place; but again we were disappointed. We conclude then, in this instance, that though the above events took place in 519, they were not the events which marked the setting up of the abomination of desolation, otherwise there would have been no mistake.

There is probably no good ground to suppose that the edict of justice published subsequently against the Arians, had anything to do with marking the commencement of any prophetic period. This warfare against the Arians was a part of the proceeding which commenced as early as 519. The emperor in commencing this work of persecution, began with the weakest sects of dissenters, and the Arians being the strongest and most influential were not attacked until the last. The persecution of these sects, however, [[illegible]] mark the date of the prophetic periods. Nor can we suppose that the Arians were the peculiar people of God in contradistinction to others. To suppose they were christians simply because they believed the Son was totally and essentially distinct from the Father, that he was the first and noblest of the creation of God, is certainly a very inconclusive argument. Admitting the sentiment they held to be true, did holding an opposite sentiment unchristianize the other sects?

Now it is a fact that the Arians have no more claim to the peculiar appellation of saints, or people of God, than the Nestorians or the Catholics. The majority of those called Catholics, Nestorians, and Arians, were undoubtedly devoted christians. It was their leaders, their bishops, and distinguished men, who acted more like Satan than anything else, of which the history speaks. The Catholics of those days were quite different from the Roman Catholics of modern date; and, although the emperors, and most of the bishops and priests, manifested a persecuting spirit, yet the mass of the people were sincere followers of Christ. This was also true of the Nestorians as a body, the only exceptions being found with the leaders. They were as orthodox in their sentiments as the Arians. "It is observed," says Buck, "to the lasting honor of the Nestorians, that of all the christian societies established in the East, they have been the most careful and successful in avoiding a multitude of superstitious opinions and practices that have infected the Greek and Latin churches."

To attempt to select any one of these sects as christians in contradistinction to the others, because the one may have believed a little more truth, or because of a more perfect understanding with regard to Christ's nature, seems the height of folly. Is it not true that the great error into which men have fallen, in almost every age, is this judging of men's christianity by their religious sentiments? Has it not been productive of more evil than anything else combined? Does not the past, the history of which has been written in blood, answer with a thousand voices, yes! Is this not the very ground upon which the Roman Catholics proceeded against the Waldenses and Vaudois? Has not the same principle led the more modern sects to disfellowship each other, with a sectarianism and bigotry almost unparalleled in the history of the world?

And where, O where will this blind zeal end, if permitted to become rampant? How many societies have been broken up through its influence! How many whose hearts were knit together in love, have been divided and driven asunder, as far as [[illegible]] evil against which we should guard with more diligence and watchfulness, than this one. It's a fiend in an angel's garb; a traitor in Messiah's camp! That we should be jealous for the truth is right, it is duty. We should seek, not only to understand the truth, but to communicate to others. But all our efforts should be characterised by christian courtesy and kindness, ever realizing that our brethren are as honest as ourselves, and would be equally glad to know the truth. We should always remember that our brethren do not differ from us any more than we do from them, and that they may be as capable of understanding the truth as ourselves.

A mere difference of opinion with regard to religious matters should not destroy our fellowship for one another. We should ever guard against quite a common evil, that of applying false epithets to those who differ with us, or, allow ourselves to reflect on the motives of others, simply because of a difference of opinion, while they sustain an upright walk with God. To pursue such a course, is disastrous—is ruinous! It is a tree whose fruit is evil, and only evil continually, whose ultimate fate is to be hewn down and cast into the fire. There are no two things more diametrically opposed to each other than this spirit and pure christianity! Should we not then cultivate brotherly love, especially when it is true that we differ with each other to as great an extent as other denominations differ from us?

Thoughts on Temptations.

"Blessed is the man who endureth temptation."

There are times when the soul is peculiarly susceptible to the assaults of the devil. When the blessing of God descends upon the soul, in the baptism of the Spirit, and all is light and peace within, then the thoughts are intently fixed on the subject of redeeming love, and the affections all actively engaged in cherishing Jesus, and faith is so strong that it opens the massive gate that leads into the mysteries of God's salvation; then it is that the temptations which beset us are, as far as effects are concerned, no temptations at all; and it is no work to [[illegible]] resist them. But hours will come when tribulations and temptations come up like a mighty army; when the brain is weary, and perhaps perplexing thoughts are crowding into the soul, and some care or anxiety distracts the mind; then it is that the "tug of war" comes; then "Christian" needs his trustiest weapon, and skill to wield it successfully; then the work of enduring temptation is a work. The army of satan moves forward, and places itself in battle array, and its hellish commander appears with his command, to charge and rush upon the soul of that single Christian, and they are soon in the heat of the battle, enveloped in clouds of dust and smoke, and nothing is known of the prospects of the battle but the clang of the steel, the thundering of the captains and the shouting of that Christian. He is alone, fighting that host of malignant foes; pray for him.

How will the battle terminate? Will he be slain? The sound of the battle has died away, the cloud is lifted. Behold, and wonder at the results! The christian is still living, while the ground is covered with slain foes. How is that? Oh! we have it; he was not alone, as we thought; the Lord, strong and mighty; the Lord, mighty in battle—he came down, and clothed him with strength, and he conquered; and now, weary from the battle, he is standing, leaning against the cross erected there, and as he gazes out upon the slain, his heart leaps for joy, and he shouts VICTORY, with a triumphant soul, while a glorious light is shining about him.

"Blessed," indeed, "is the man who endureth temptation," for he shall, when he is tried, receive a crown of life, and live to see his foes slain, and shall reign with Christ forever. Glory to God! The battle is fought; the victory is won! O, how blessed!

Tempted christian, in this your hour of fierce conflict, look up, and behold the light shining about you; gird on your sword, and fight with a spirit determined to conquer, and VICTORY IS YOURS.

HO TIS.

A HEAVENLY HOUSE.—I once met with an aged colored woman who, in giving me the history of her humble life, mentioned the following circumstance: "We lived a good while in the family of Dr. Livingston of New Brunswick. Oh, that was a good time for old Joe and I. That was a heavenly house—worship every morning and evening, and always called in." Such was Aunt Betty's idea of "a heavenly house," and she was not very wide of the mark; where God is worshiped "every morning and evening," and the humblest members of the family are always called in.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 13.

MY DEAR SISTER,—There is a class of "Perfectionists," who claim to be not only saved from sin, but also from all liability to sin. Having once attained to entire sanctification, they remain permanently, yea, eternally sanctified. In proof of their position they quote the language of the apostle John: "Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him. He that committeth sin, is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning .... Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."—"We know that whosoever is born of God, sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God, keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not."

We are not familiar with the arguments of this class of religionists, and therefore are not prepared to give, nor to refute them. We know that they lay an undue stress upon the expression "cannot sin," when they consider it as teaching the impossibility of a sanctified soul's falling into sin. God cannot lie, i. e., he cannot consistently with his character—it is contrary to his purity—it would be in direct violation of his holiness. Adam and Eve, though in a perfectly sinless state, fell from it into a condition of depravity and condemnation. The exhortations to watchfulness and prayerfulness, lest we fall into temptation; to take heed, lest we come short of the promised rest; lest we fall; lest any man take our crown; afford evidences of danger to those who are not watchful unto prayer. The apostle John writes precious truths to his "beloved," that they may not sin; but knowing the weakness and infirmities of poor human nature, he adds for their encouragement, if by any means they yield to temptation, that if they sin, they have an advocate with the Father, who is the propitiation for their sins.

In the verses we have quoted, the apostle most plainly contrasts the character of those who abide in Christ, and those who are out of him. The one is a righteous character, sinning not, the other is an un[[illegible]] showing by his sinful [[illegible]] righteous character, [[illegible]] and not of acts that he is of the devil, [[illegible]] God. While the "seed" which is "incorruptible," and by which the person is "born again," "remaineth in him;" while the "word of God" is cherished in his heart, he will "grow thereby," and have power to resist the wiles of Satan. Says David—"Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." The "word of God" hid in the heart, is a sure preservative against sin. It is the "sword of the Spirit," and "faith" in that word constitutes the successful "shield" of the christian's armor. It can quench every fiery dart of the enemy. When Satan tempted Christ in the wilderness, he found the "word of God" to be sharper than any "two-edged sword," and while with "faith" he wielded it, all of Satan's darts were rendered powerless. Thus most every christian overcome.

There can be no such thing a[[illegible]] one grand struggle against sin, [[illegible]] then the eternal victory be gained. There is no such thing as having one fearful contest with Satan, and then be forever free from his temptations. For forty days was Jesus tempted, and then Satan only left him "for a season." The injunction of the Savior, "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation," and of the apostle, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed, lest he fall," would be inapplicable to those who were saved from all liability to yield to temptation, and thereby fall from their christian position. The exhortation to "beware lest we also be led away by the error of the wicked," and to "fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of us should seem to come short of it," belongs not to such. If the good apostle Paul deemed it necessary for him to keep his body under, and bring it into subjection to Christ, lest, after having preached to others, he himself should be a cast-away, we surely have need, even after attaining to the highest degree of christian perfection available here; to "watch and pray" to "take heed," and to "fear," lest we, after all, "forsake the right way," and thus another take our crown.

May God lead you speedily, my sister, into the possession of a "pure heart," and grant you that "establishing grace," which is essential to give permanency to christian experience, and may you be kept by the power of God through faith unto [[illegible]] salvation. Your sincere friend,

H.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 2, 1859.

Salutatory.

Would that we could take each reader by the hand and give it a hearty shake, because we think we should receive a cordial welcome in our new dress. Please accept the wish for the deed. We desire to make our weekly visits as agreeable and profitable to all as possible, and on this account, we have enlarged our room to give place for more visitors, and having changed our apparel, we trust you will not be ashamed of our company, but permit us to visit with your neighbors and friends without restraint. We do not propose to entertain them with anecdote, wit and fiction, but with the sublime, heart-searching, soul-stirring, life-giving truth from the book of books.

We shall endeavor to make our conversation profitable rather than pleasing; instructive than elegant; good than learned. We wish to talk with those who listen as familiarly and kindly as do the most intimate companions; and we hope in return to have a place in your affections and prayers. We have started with you for the land of glory; and though we have not yet seen all the pilgrims on the way, we love and hope soon to greet you in the bowers of Eden, where sickness, pain and sorrow are unknown, where sin has no place, and virtue is periled no more forever.

Our Heading

We consider our heading—The World's Crisis—as peculiarly expressive of the solemn position occupied by the present generation. All classes seem free to admit that some great event is about to burst upon the world, surpassing in its extent and grandeur all former revolutions, that have rent in pieces the kingdoms and empires of earlier days. There seems to be foreboding of what is foretold by the prophet Daniel in chap. 2: 35, where he is giving an illustration of the destruction of the great image, used to symbolize the kingdoms of this world; when he says;—"Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them." We believe this event is near, very near, when we "shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Let us all be ready for the sublime event.

Our Position and Purpose.

1. We admit that we … "sect … belong to the … every where … spoken against;" and, in this world, never expect to be reckoned with any other. We esteem "the reproach of Christ greater riches" than the treasures and honors of this world; "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

2. We "confess, … "that after the way which they call heresy, so worship" we "the God of" our "fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets, and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust."

3. We acknowledge that we are fallible, have made mistakes, and are equally liable to make more, hence we do not make a belief in our peculiar views a test of fellowship.

4. We receive, as brethren in Christ, all who love and obey him, following the best light within their reach. We have no sympathy with iron-bedstead tests which cut off those who do not say "shibboleth" to our particular creed. We think for ourselves, and wish others to do the same; and so long as we can see that the ruling motive is to do all to the glory of God, we most cordially embrace such as our christian brethren, in fellowship and communion, whatever be their denominational title.

5. We most firmly believe that the second personal coming of Christ is near at hand, and that when he comes, he will set up his everlasting kingdom upon the earth, and "reign over the house of Jacob for ever."

6. We believe the dead are unconscious between death and the resurrection, and that when Christ comes, he will raise those "which sleep in Jesus," and make them incorruptible and immortal, thus preparing them to "possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever, and ever."

7. We believe the wicked will be raised, judged, condemned, and "punished with everlasting destruction," when sin and misery will cease forever; the good alone having "eternal life," which is "the gift of God . . . . through Jesus Christ our Lord."

II.

Our purpose. In view of our position, we intend to speak plainly, but kindly, … king no compromise with error, yet … every man's opinion with respect. … to keep back nothing that is … not shun to declare all the … as we understand it. …

… tion; neither do we intend to have our paper like a slop pail to receive every thing that may be written. We shall act on the eclectic principle, and endeavor to do the best we can to "feed the flock of God," and "give them meat in due season."

3. We purpose to avoid all controversies and reviews, "knowing that they do gender strifes." During the time we have served our readers and contributors, we have not reviewed a single article which we have allowed in our columns; and we still intend to pursue the same course in the future, and wish all to act in harmony with us in this matter. We claim no privileges that we will not cheerfully grant to others. If articles appear in our columns which need correction, write your own views in a style so kind, clear and truthful as to cause the one in error to see the truth and light, and embrace the same with cheerful delight. Ten may be overcome in this way, while one is gained in open combat.

4. We purpose to allow no unkind remarks in our columns, in relation to any one, and should any be received for publication, however valuable the article, we should deem it a sufficient reason for its rejection. We hope all will adhere strictly to this request. Let us all try to do the best we can; love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous; not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing; but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing.

Portland Conference

We have some good news to give of our meetings in this city. In company with Bro. Burnham we commenced them Wednesday, P. M., Feb. 16th, and continued them through the week and over the Lord's day. The brethren in this city have passed through many sore trials and distracting conflicts during the last few years, until many became completely discouraged, lay down and fell asleep on the brink of ruin. Nothing but perils were about them. The most stout-hearted had well nigh fainted and yielded to the enemy. A few weeks since, some resolved more firmly to maintain their integrity in the cause of Christ, and at once carried their good resolutions into practice, by repairing the house of the Lord, and engaging more heartily in his service, determining that christian character should be the test of fellowship instead of a belief in disputed points of doctrine. As soon as this foundation was laid, an earnest feeling in behalf of the sinner and the backslider succeeded, and they at once resolved to make an extra effort to reach the people, and, accordingly, appointed the conf… closed … conference just … which has resulted in the conversion of some eight or ten, and the restoration of a good number of backsliders, whom we left rejoicing in the blessed hope. Although the weather was unfavorable, our house was too small to accommodate the people, and during the latter part of the time, a good many had to remain standing.

Lord's day morning, we met at half past nine o'clock for a love feast, which, as many said, was a feast indeed. In fifty minutes eighty arose and testified of their firm determination to live the life of the christian. It was good to be there. At noon, five were buried with Christ in baptism, among whom was the wife and daughter of Bro. J. S. Brooks, and a young lady boarding with them. Our brother now says rejoicingly, "as for me and my house we will serve the Lord." Several others are waiting an opportunity to show by baptism their faith in the burial and resurrection of Christ.

In the evening, we enjoyed a blessed season around the table of the Lord, in company with about seventy of the children of the Most High. It was a weeping and rejoicing time in a heavenly place. At the close of the sacrament, eight came forward for prayers, six of whom arose and testified at the close of the meeting, feeling a peace of mind because of sins forgiven. Many are under deep conviction, who have not yet had courage to take a bold stand for Jesus and his word.

At this conference, we met Bro. Wm. Mitchell, from Kennebunk Port, Me.; L. L. Howard, and Bro. Libby, West Poland; R. R. York, Yarmouth; B. S. Emory, Portland, who have given themselves to the ministry; and, besides these, several other brethren and sisters from different towns. We left Brn. Emory, Libby and Howard to continue the meetings another week. When we hear again from Portland, we shall expect good tidings.

Day of Publishing.—It sometimes happens that our readers complain that our paper, though published Wednesday, does not reach them any sooner than other papers published on Saturday. The reason is this:—we date our paper the day it leaves the office, and others date theirs three or four days after it is mailed. In this matter, we choose not to follow the popular custom.

Fictitious Names.—We wish all would sign their true name, or initials, to their articles designed for the Crisis. Those with a genuine signature are read with much more interest. Let us, who love the … so well, not deal in fiction. Will …

"The Grand Conspiracy."

The following is the heading of an interesting article from an English writer, who is a close observer of the signs of the times, and the movements of the nations. He seems to be convinced that the great day of the Lord is at hand, when the kingdoms of earth shall give place to the everlasting kingdom of God and his Son. He says:

"There can be no longer any doubt that a grand conspiracy has been formed between two of the leading powers of Europe, against the peace and independence of half the world." "A pamphlet has lately appeared in France, stamped and authorized by the French government. The writer has assumed the fictitious name of Jacques Bonnefoi, and under this name he has brought out some most startling announcements. He asserts that France and Russia are to commence simultaneously. Russia by the invasion of Turkey, and France by the invasion of England. He asserts that throughout all France, from Paris to the remotest village, but one cry is heard, which is—War with England. … Being authorized and stamped by the government, there can be no doubt but that it is written and published with the full approval of the authorities, and amounts to … decla- ration of the preconceived … It is well known that in all … arms are manufactured, th… are now at work day and … night the air is filled … flame of a thousand furn… stunned by the sounds o… It should also be stated th… have been added to the … already so numerous, and th… minister at war has promised the Emperor that by the end of next (now present) February, he will place at his disposal 100,000 men ready to march in any direction his majesty may indicate. … We see in this no symptom of drawing back, but every symptom of some unknown but settled plan of the most determined action. Some grand design has long been formed, and the apparent delay is only in proportion to the magnitude of the scheme—a scheme of universal dominion."

"With reference to Italy, some important revelations have been made. It is said that the Pope has recently become highly irritated against the French government in consequence of a certain plan which has come to light. A Sardinian army is, as soon as possible, to cross the Ticino, and to invade the Austrian province of Lombardy. This army is to act as the advance guard of a much larger French force, which is to follow; and by the joint action of the two, the Austrians are to be driven out of Lombardy, and the whole of Italy is to be re-partitioned. Sardinia is to acquire a part of the territory; but the lion's share, of course, is to be assigned to France. Prince Napoleon is to be placed on the throne of Lombardy, and to assume the iron crown of the ancient Lombard Kings! One half of the Roman States are to be added to his dominions, so as to make up what may be called the kingdom of Italy, of which Venice, also, is to form a part. The pope is reduced to the … Rom… to the sovereignty of … itself, with no other domain whatever! Such is the Italian scheme, which has been made public in the continental papers, and which has given such umbrage to the Pope. And well it may, and to all Europe besides. We believe every particle of it to be absolutely true. … It is for this that the whole youth of Italy have been excited into fury, and that 400,000 men are getting ready for the military season of 1859.

That France and Russia are about to co-operate, there can be but little doubt. The two Emperors are now on terms of the most evident friendship. The marriage of Prince Napoleon with a sister of the Emperor Alexander, is spoken of as determined on. … From the beginning of 1859, we may consider the Mediterranean as a Franco-Russian lake, hereafter to be converted into one entirely French. Italy, Turkey, Egypt, North Africa, and Palestine, will fall into the hands of the two Emperors. … War has become a necessity, and necessity has no choice. … It is a well known impression of Napoleon the Third, that he was born and 'destined to complete whatever the first Napoleon left unfinished.' That he is in fact, the complement to Napoleon the First. The idea is a most striking one. It is grand and original, in the very highest degree. So grand and original, indeed, that it could scarcely have occurred to any mind, unless it had been implanted by some over-ruling power. One man the complement to another. Two men in one, to make up one great circle of achievement. … With this vast design, he is now carrying on a series of preparations, for which nothing but so vast a design can account. All the dock yards, arsenals, and military manufactories of France, are at work night and day; and new engines of destruction are growing into shape, like some new-born monster of the antediluvian world. But will he carry out his design? We think he will do so in his own person; we are morally certain that he will attempt it immediately, and on the most formidable scale.

The year 1859 opens with a grand and solemn scene. All nations are agitated and alarmed. All are in expectation of what is to come. Revolution is spreading over all the Roman world,—from the Irish seas to the Euphrates. Nations are arming for some unknown and frightful conflict. … Peace is dead and thrown aside; no spirit alive but the spirit of bloodshed. And in the centre of the centre, with all the powers and spirits of the age grouped around him, is one dark, silent man, with one vast inscrutable design, awaiting the moment to begin, while the eyes of Europe are fixed upon him, under the spell of fascination. All men are sure of some terrible event, but none are able to foretell its nature or its end. The crimes of a thousand years rise slowly from the earth, and float like spectres across the sky of christendom. … Yet our church is asleep; our clergy are silent! . . . Hypocrisy has spread its leprosy over church and state—nothing but hypocrisy is left." [The last vials." Jan. 1859.]

"The Scriptures cannot be broken." Jesus.—Then we must hvae upon "earth distress of nations, with perplexity," near the time when Christ is to make his second advent. He has told us plainly that such a state of things will immediately precede his glorious, personal appearing. We think there is no room for doubt, that we are very …

For the Crisis.

The Cause in the West.

Since I last wrote, my meetings have been attended with great interest. Shabbona Grove quarterly meeting was, considering the weather, well attended. I continued the meeting ten days, as the interest increased. I think much good will be the … at Wilton, … result. My quarterly meeting … Iowa, was a glorious one. The church was strengthened, sceptics trembled, and some were converted. One infidel came to me the last night as I was about leaving, and handing me a dollar, said, "Take that to pay expenses. I want you to come back soon. There is some sense in listening to preaching I can understand." I left there for Brown Co., Ill. Met my appointment, but had to leave after holding the meeting four days, promising to return in three weeks. Held a quarterly meeting at Warsaw prairie. Brn. Pratt and Scott were present. The Lord blessed his truth. I left Bro. Pratt's on Tuesday for Earlville. Commenced our meeting Thursday evening, continued till over Sunday. The word took effect. I trust the judgment will unfold a good result.

From thence returned home, stopping a few days, and preached some of the time in Princeton, Iowa. On Tuesday started for Brown Co., to meet my appointment, to commence Jan. 13th. Engaged Bro. Walter Pratt to attend my quarterly meeting at Elizabeth, Jo Davis Co., to commence the same time. (I would say to the church in Elizabeth, that sickness prevented Bro. Pratt from fulfilling his appointment. He will visit them as soon as possible.) Arrived there in time to commence my meeting. Had a large attendance all through, notwithstanding mud and mire, and continued twenty-five days. Much opposition and prejudice to contend against, but God cleared the way, and the word took effect. We had thirty or forty reclaimed or converted, and left a good interest, many inquiring the way. Baptized sixteen, and added to the church five and twenty, and more I think will unite soon. God took in hand some very hard cases. One man, eighty-seven years old, in his younger days professed to be converted, and joined the C. Baptist church, but left it and became a Universalist, and has been living with that faith till now; but God has opened his eyes. He had a son and a grand-daughter who started for the kingdom. I hope they will endure to the end.

The Lord is still at work. From thence I returned home. I have pressing calls on every hand to come and give the word of life. O, that there were many more faithful laborers in the vineyard of the Lord! The Master will soon be here, and work be over, but my heart cries out,

> "Great Author of compassion,
> Redeemer, Savior, Friend,
> O, send to every nation
> The knowledge of its end!
> Fly, fly, on wings of morning!
> Ye who the truth can tell,
> And sound the awful warning,
> To rescue souls from hell."

In hope as ever, Moses Chandler.

"My Two Witnesses."

Upon the question, Who are the witnesses? much has been said. Some have supposed them to be the two testaments. This appears irrational. Bp. Newton thought the two witnesses to represent the few faithful followers of Christ through the 1260 years.

The ambassadors of Christ are called witnesses in many sacred passages.—"And ye are witnesses of these things." Lk. 24: 48. "And ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea … and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." Acts 1: 8. Accordingly we abundantly find them afterward so denominated. "One must be ordained to be a witness with us of the resurrection."—Acts 1: 22. "This Jesus hath God raised up whereof we all are witnesses."—Acts 2: 32. "Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even unto us." Acts 10: 41. Does not the clause, I will give power unto my two witnesses, imply that they are persons known by this appellation? But who are so well known by this appellation as the true ministers of Christ? The prophesying of the witnesses, Dr. Lowman observes, "signifies persons full of the Spirit of God, preaching God's word and bearing witness to the truth." (On Rev. p. 109.) The witnesses are called the two prophets, who tormented them that dwell on the earth. Rev. 11: 10. But who else answer so well to this description as do the faithful preachers of the Gospel? These, says the Revelator, are the two olive trees. This relates to Zech. 4: 3, 11–14. The two olive trees there are supposed to have been Joshua and Zerubbabel, who unitedly prefigured Christ, and who, Pool supposes, prefigured also the ambassadors of Christ. There (said the angel to Zechariah) are the two anointed ones (sons of oil, Heb.) that stand by the Lord of the whole earth. The gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit are represented by the anointing with oil. And the ascension-gifts of Christ to his ambassadors, for the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ, render it fit for them to be called olive trees, or sons of oil. Thus reference appears to be had in the witnesses more immediately to the ministers of Christ.

But the witnesses are also the two candlesticks. A candlestick is a noted emblem of the church. "The seven candlesticks which thou sawest, are the seven churches." Rev. 1: 20. Doubtless the true members of Christ are not to be excluded from constituting the witnesses."—Dissertation on the prophecies, pp. 172–174.

… the "two witnesses?" Two … testimony. Why said to … witnesses constitute a complete … They seem to be prophetic witnesses. They … cause the Old and New Testament prophecies to "speak" or testify against a certain power which will so enrage the latter that it will make an effort and succeed, to a fearful extent, to cause these witnesses to be killed. To war then upon the witnesses will be to war on the Lamb. Whether other features may not more fully develop the dual number of these witnesses, is yet to be ascertained.

Now if we can find the power that kills, then we may more fully determine the time of their being killed. We have endeavored to show that the eighth head of the leopard beast, or the revived seventh, was the last wicked power with which the church would have to contend; and for further proof we remark that the beast in Rev. 17, is represented as having seven heads, and also there are seven kings. "'They are also seven kings,' (Cov.) 'They are seven kings,' (Newman.) 'And they are seven kings,' (Dou.) 'They are seven kings,' (Tyn)."—Berick's Grand Crisis, p. 357. "Five are fallen."—John sees this scenery in the wilderness state of the church. He was carried into the then future wilderness to mark more distinctly future events and the chronology of the same, precisely as Daniel was in vision carried down to the palace in Sushan, then future, to see the vision of the ram and goat, though he himself was still in Babylon. In this state John sees a beast having seven heads, a kind of double symbol, representing geographically, as well as politically, the condition of the woman which it carries. In this advanced position he says, "Five are fallen, one is," leaving only one more to arise to make up the seven. The sixth head of that leopard beast being Austria, as our brethren admit, then France was the seventh when Napoleon espoused the cause of the church, and answered well to the prediction in continuing but a "short space." The kings of Europe combined did wound the seventh head with the sword, and passed a decree that it should have no resurrection. But it rises at length,—the deadly wound is healed,—the beast revives, and all the world are wondering, while "they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is." With wonderful precision do we behold the Napoleonic dynasty, filling up this last scene of the prophetic drama.

We are informed that this eighth head, or the revived seventh head, ascends "OUT OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT;" "and (is the one that) goeth into perdition." Now in chap. 11: 7, we read concerning the two witnesses thus: "And when they shall have finished their testimony, the BEAST THAT ASCENDETH OUT OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT shall make war against them, and shall overcome them and kill them." Thus we learn that this last, or revived head of that scarlet beast, is the one that COMETH OUT OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT—is the one that kills the witnesses, does the same work that the two-horned beast was to do to those who receive not the "mark." And as the wounded head was not revived until Louis Napoleon seized upon the imperial crown, and cries, "The Empire is peace," it follows that the killing of the witnesses is an event subsequent to that eventful "2d of Dec." 1852, and will be accomplished ere this "head" goeth into perdition.

Summing up. 1st. The witnesses will have finished, or, as some render it, will be about to finish their testimony, when a power shall rise up and kill them.

2d. The power which kills them is a power that comes out of the bottomless pit, or abyss, therefore must have been thrown into that abyss of death, or darkness, before it could have come out.

3d. As the finishing up of the testimony of Christ will be the third angel's message—"If any man worship the beast or his image,"—it follows that the power here implicated will be the power which will kill them. And thus we read Rev. 13: 15.—"And he (the two-horned beast) had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and cause as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed."

4th. As this image is a revived power, it well synchronizes with the revived head of the scarlet beast, Rev. 17, that "goeth into perdition."

5th. As the work of the beast from the bottomless pit is to kill the witnesses, and as the work of the two-horned beast is to kill the witnesses, it follows that they are one and the same power, their chronology being the same.

6th. As the eighth head of the scarlet beast is the beast that "ascendeth out of the bottomless pit," and as it is declared that the beast that "ascendeth out of the bottomless pit doth kill the witnesses," then it follows that the eighth head will accomplish that work.

7th. Therefore, as we believe that we have proved that the revived Napoleonic dynasty is the eighth head of the scarlet beast—which did "ascend out of the bottomless pit," as the revelator declares—then it follows that that power will accomplish its work on the remnant who have the TESTIMONY of Jesus Christ.

May the Lord give us wisdom that we may gain "the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name," and "stand … of glass having the harps of God."

The New Volume.

Come, now, are you not glad to see this improvement? "Yes, but I am afraid the expenses wont be met." Well, what will you do towards it? "I would help if I had any money." Have you any influence? If so, you can get subscribers in two ways; first, if you are doing business with those that are favorable to the position we take, and are poor, help them some way to the paper. I have taken work of some, and wood of others, butter, cheese, grain, lumber, &c. With a little trouble, you can get a number of subscribers and help the paper, and the people that read it. It is not the paper as a paper we want to go, it is the light it carries.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 2, 1859.

Salutatory.

Would that we could take each reader by the hand and give it a hearty shake, because we think we should receive a cordial welcome in our new dress. Please accept the wish for the deed. We desire to make our weekly visits as agreeable and profitable to all as possible; and on this account, we have enlarged our room to give place for more visitors, and having changed our apparel, we trust you will not be ashamed of our company, but permit us to visit with your neighbors and friends without restraint. We do not propose to entertain them with anecdote, wit and fiction, but with the sublime, heart-searching, soul-stirring, life-giving truth from the book of books.

We shall endeavor to make our conversation profitable, rather than pleasing; instructive than elegant; good than learned. We wish to talk with those who listen, as familiarly and kindly as do the most intimate companions; and, we hope, in return to have a place in your affections and prayers. We have started with you for the land of glory; and though we have not yet seen all the pilgrims on the way, we love and hope soon to greet you in the bowers of Eden, where sickness, pain and sorrow are unknown, where sin has no place, and virtue is periled no more forever.

Our Heading.

We consider our heading—THE WORLD'S CRISIS—as peculiarly expressive of the solemn position occupied by the present generation. All classes seem free to admit that some great event is about to burst upon the world, surpassing in its extent and grandeur all former revolutions, that have rent in pieces the kingdoms and empires of earlier days. There seems to be foreboding of what is foretold by the prophet Daniel in chap. 2: 35, where he is giving an illustration of the destruction of the great image, used to symbolize the kingdoms of this world; when he says;—"Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them." We believe this event is near, very near, when we "shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Let us all be ready for the sublime event.

Our Position and Purpose.

1. We admit that we ... "sect ... ... every where . . . spoken against;" and, in this world, never expect to be reckoned with any other. We esteem "the reproach of Christ greater riches" than the treasures and honors of this world; "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

2. We "confess, . . . "that after the way which they call heresy, so worship" we "the God of" our "fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets, and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust."

3. We acknowledge that we are fallible, have made mistakes, and are equally liable to make more, hence we do not make a belief in our peculiar views a test of fellow-...

4. We receive, as brethren in Christ, all who love and obey him, following the best light within their reach. We have no sympathy with iron-bedstead tests which cut off those who do not say "shibboleth" to our particular creed. We think for ourselves, and wish others to do the same; and so long as we can see that the ruling motive is to do all to the glory of God, we most cordially embrace such as our christian brethren, in fellowship and communion, whatever be their denominational title.

5. We most firmly believe that the second personal coming of Christ is near at hand, and that when he comes, he will set up his everlasting kingdom upon the earth, and "reign over the house of Jacob for ever."

6. We believe the dead are unconscious between death and the resurrection, and that when Christ comes he will raise those "which sleep in Jesus," and make them incorruptible and immortal, thus preparing them to "possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever, and ever."

7. We believe the wicked will be raised, judged, condemned, and "punished with everlasting destruction," when sin and misery will cease forever; the good alone having "eternal life," which is "the gift of God . . . . through Jesus Christ our Lord."

II.

OUR JOURNAL. In view of our position, we intend to speak plainly, but kindly, ... no compromise with error, yet ... every man's opinion with respect, ... to keep back nothing that is ... not shun to declare all the ... as we understand it.

... tion; neither do we intend to have our paper like a slop pail to receive every thing that may be written. We shall act on the eclectic principle, and endeavor to do the best we can to "feed the flock of God," and "give them meat in due season."

3. We purpose to avoid all controversies and reviews, "knowing that they do gender strifes." During the time we have served our readers and contributors, we have not reviewed a single article which we have allowed in our columns; and we still intend to pursue the same course in the future, and wish all to act in harmony with us in this matter. We claim no privileges that we will not cheerfully grant to others. If articles appear in our columns which need correction, write your own views in a style so kind, clear and truthful, as to cause the one in error to see the truth and light, and embrace the same with cheerful delight. Ten may be overcome in this way, while one is gained in open combat.

4. We purpose to allow no unkind remarks in our columns, in relation to any one, and should any be received for publication, however valuable the article, we should deem it a sufficient reason for its rejection. We hope all will adhere strictly to this request. Let us all try to do the best we can, "love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous; not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing; but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing."

Portland Conference.

We have some good news to give of our meetings in this city. In company with Bro. Burnham we commenced them Wednesday, P. M., Feb. 16th, and continued them through the week and over the Lord's day. The brethren in this city have passed through many sore trials and distracting conflicts during the last few years, until many became completely discouraged, lay down and fell asleep on the brink of ruin. Nothing but perils were about them. The most stout-hearted had well nigh fainted and yielded to the enemy. A few weeks since, some resolved more firmly to maintain their integrity in the cause of Christ, and at once carried their good resolutions into practice, by repairing the house of the Lord, and engaging more heartily in his service, determining that christian character should be the test of fellowship instead of a belief in disputed points of doctrine. As soon as this foundation was laid, an earnest feeling in behalf of the sinner and the backslider succeeded, and they at once resolved to make an extra effort to reach the people, and, accordingly, appointed the conference ... closed ... which has resulted in the conversion of some eight or ten, and the restoration of a good number of backsliders, whom we left rejoicing in the blessed hope. Although the weather was unfavorable, our house was too small to accommodate the people, and during the latter part of the time, a good many had to remain standing.

Lord's day morning, we met at half past nine o'clock for a love feast, which, as many said, was a feast indeed. In fifty minutes eighty arose and testified of their firm determination to live the life of the christian. It was good to be there. At noon, five were buried with Christ in baptism, among whom was the wife and daughter of Bro. J. S. Brooks, and a young lady boarding with them. Our brother now says rejoicingly, "as for me and my house we will serve the Lord." Several others are waiting an opportunity to show by baptism their faith in the burial and resurrection of Christ.

In the evening, we enjoyed a blessed season around the table of the Lord, in company with about seventy of the children of the Most High. It was a weeping and rejoicing time in a heavenly place. At the close of the sacrament, eight came forward for prayers, six of whom arose and testified at the close of the meeting, feeling a peace of mind because of sins forgiven. Many are under deep conviction, who have not yet had courage to take a bold stand for Jesus and his word.

At this conference, we met Bro. Wm. Mitchell, from Kennebunk Port, Me.; L. L. Howard, and Bro. Libby, West Poland; R. R. York, Yarmouth; B. S. Emory, Portland, who have given themselves to the ministry; and, besides these, several other brethren and sisters from different towns. We left Brn. Emory, Libby and Howard to continue the meetings another week. When we hear again from Portland, we shall expect good tidings.

DAY OF PUBLISHING.—It sometimes happens that our readers complain that our paper, though published Wednesday, does not reach them any sooner than other papers published on Saturday. The reason is this:—we date our paper the day it leaves the office, and others date theirs three or four days after it is mailed. In this matter, we choose not to follow the popular custom.

FICTITIOUS NAMES.—We wish all would sign their true name, or initials, to their articles designed for the Crisis. Those with a genuine signature are read with much more interest. Let us, who love the ... so well, not deal in fiction. Will ...

"The Grand Conspiracy."

The following is the heading of an interesting article from an English writer, who is a close observer of the signs of the times, and the movements of the nations. He seems to be convinced that the great day of the Lord is at hand, when the kingdoms of earth shall give place to the everlasting kingdom of God and his Son. He says:

"There can be no longer any doubt that A GRAND CONSPIRACY has been formed between two of the leading powers of Europe, against the peace and independence of half the world." "A pamphlet has lately appeared in France, stamped and authorised by the French government. The writer has assumed the fictitious name of Jacques Bonnefoi, and under this name he has brought out some most startling announcements. He asserts that France and Russia are to commence simultaneously: Russia by the invasion of Turkey, and France by the invasion of England. He asserts that throughout all France, from Paris to the remotest village, but one cry is heard, which is—'War with England.' . . . . Being authorized and stamped by the government, there can be no doubt but that it is written and published with the full approval of the authorities, and amounts to a ... declaration of the preconceived ... It is well known that in all ... arms are manufactured, th... are now at work day and ... night the air is filled w... flame of a thousand furn... stunned by the sounds of ... It should also be stated th... have been added to the ... already so numerous; and the ... minister at war has promised the Emperor that, by the end of next (now present) February, he will place at his disposal 400,000 men, ready to march in any direction his majesty may indicate. We see in this no symptom of drawing back, but every symptom of some unknown but settled plan of the most determined action. Some grand design has long been formed, and the apparent delay is only in proportion to the magnitude of the scheme—a scheme of universal dominion."

"With reference to ITALY, some important revelations have been made. It is said that the Pope has recently become highly irritated against the French government in consequence of a certain plan which has come to light. A Sardinian army is, as soon as possible, to cross the Ticino, and to invade the Austrian province of Lombardy. This army is to act as the advance guard of a much larger French force, which is to follow; and by the joint action of the two, the Austrians are to be driven out of Lombardy, and the whole of Italy is to be re-partitioned. Sardinia is to acquire a part of the territory; but the lion's share, of course, is to be assigned to France. Prince Napoleon is to be placed on the throne of Lombardy, and to assume the iron crown of the ancient Lombard Kings! One half of the Roman States are to be added to his dominions, so as to make up what may be called the kingdom of Italy, of which Venice, also, is to form a part. . . The pope is reduced to the ... the sovereignty of ... itself, with no other domain whatever! Such is the Italian scheme, which has been made public in the continental papers, and which has given such umbrage to the Pope. And well it may, and to all Europe besides. We believe every particle of it to be absolutely TRUE. . . . It is for this that the whole youth of Italy have been excited into fury, and that 400,000 men are getting ready for the military season of 1859. That FRANCE and RUSSIA are about to co-operate, there can be but little doubt. The two Emperors are now on terms of the most evident friendship. The marriage of Prince Napoleon with a sister of the Emperor Alexander, is spoken of as determined on. . . . From the beginning of 1859, we may consider the Mediterranean as a Franco-Russian lake, hereafter to be converted into one entirely French. Italy, Turkey, Egypt, North Africa, and PALESTINE, will fall into the hands of the two Emperors. . . . War has become a NECESSITY, and necessity has no choice. . . . It is a well known impression of Napoleon the Third, that he was born and 'destined to complete whatever the first Napoleon left unfinished.' That he is in fact, the COMPLEMENT to Napoleon the First. The idea is a most striking one. It is grand and original, in the very highest degree. So grand and original, indeed, that it could scarcely have occurred to any mind, unless it had been implanted by some over-ruling power. One man the complement to another. Two men in one, to make up one great circle of achievement. . . With this vast design, he is now carrying on a series of preparations, for which nothing but so vast a design can account. All the dock yards, arsenals, and military manufactories of France, are at work night and day; and new engines of destruction are growing into shape, like some new-born monster of the antediluvian world. But will he carry out his design? We think he will do so in his own person: we are morally certain that he will attempt it immediately, and on the most formidable scale.

"The year 1859 opens with a grand and solemn scene. All nations are agitated and alarmed. All are in expectation of what is to come. Revolution is spreading over all the Roman world,—from the Irish seas to the Euphrates. Nations are arming for some unknown and frightful conflict. . . . Peace is dead and thrown aside; no spirit alive but the spirit of bloodshed. And in the centre of the centre, with all the powers and spirits of the age grouped around him, is one dark, silent MAN, with one vast inscrutable design, awaiting the moment to begin, while the eyes of Europe are fixed upon him, under the spell of FASCINATION. All men are sure of some terrible event, but none are able to foretell its nature or its end. The crimes of a thousand years rise slowly from the earth, and float like spectres across the sky of christendom. . . Yet our church is asleep; our clergy are silent! . . . HYPOCRISY has spread its leprosy over church and state—nothing but hypocrisy is left." [The last vials." Jan. 1859.]

The Cause in the West.

Since I last wrote, my meetings have been attended with great interest. Shabbona Grove quarterly meeting was, considering the weather, well attended. I continued the meeting ten days, as the interest increased. I think much good will be the ... at Wilton, ... result. My quarterly meeting ... Iowa, was a glorious one. The church was strengthened, sceptics trembled, and some were converted. One infidel came to me the last night as I was about leaving, and handing me a dollar, said, "Take that to pay expenses. I want you to come back soon. There is some sense in listening to preaching I can understand." I left there for Brown Co., Ill. Met my appointment, but had to leave after holding the meeting four days, promising to return in three weeks. Held a quarterly meeting at Warsaw prairie. Brn. Pratt and Scott were present. The Lord blessed his truth. I left Bro. Pratt's on Tuesday for Earlville. Commenced our meeting Thursday evening, continued till over Sunday. The word took effect. I trust the judgment will unfold a good result.

From thence returned home, stopping a few days, and preached some of the time in Princeton, Iowa. On Tuesday started for Brown Co., to meet my appointment, to commence Jan. 13th. Engaged Bro. Walter Pratt to attend my quarterly meeting at Elizabeth, Jo Davis Co., to commence the same time. (I would say to the church in Elizabeth, that sickness prevented Bro. Pratt from fulfilling his appointment. He will visit them as soon as possible.) Arrived there in time to commence my meeting. Had a large attendance all through, notwithstanding mud and mire, and continued twenty-five days. Much opposition and prejudice to contend against, but God cleared the way, and the word took effect. We had thirty or forty reclaimed or converted, and left a good interest, many inquiring the way. Baptized sixteen, and added to the church five and twenty, and more I think will unite soon. God took in hand some very hard cases. One man, eighty-seven years old, in his younger days professed to be converted, and joined the C. Baptist church, but left it and became a Universalist, and has been living with that faith till now; but God has opened his eyes. He had a son and a grand-daughter who started for the kingdom. I hope they will endure to the end.

The Lord is still at work. From thence I returned home. I have pressing calls on every hand to come and give the word of life. O, that there were many more faithful laborers in the vineyard of the Lord! The Master will soon be here, and work be over, but my heart cries out,

"Great Author of compassion,
Redeemer, Savior, Friend,
O, send to every nation
The knowledge of its end!
Fly, fly, on wings of morning!
Ye who the truth can tell,
And sound the awful warning,
To rescue souls from hell."

In hope as ever, MOSES CHANDLER.

"My Two Witnesses."

Upon the question, Who are the witnesses? much has been said. Some have supposed them to be the two testaments. This appears irrational. Bp. Newton thought the two witnesses to represent the few faithful followers of Christ through the 1260 years.

The ambassadors of Christ are called witnesses in many sacred passages.—"And ye are witness of these things." Lk. 24: 48. "And ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea . . . and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." Acts 1: 8. Accordingly we abundantly find them afterward so denominated. One "must be ordained to be a witness with us of the resurrection."—Acts 1: 22. "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses."—Acts 2: 32. "Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even unto us." Acts 10: 41. Does not the clause, I will give power unto my two witnesses, imply that they are persons known by this appellation? But who are so well known by this appellation as the true ministers of Christ? The prophesying of the witnesses, Dr. Lowman observes, "signifies persons full of the Spirit of God; preaching God's word, and bearing witness to the truth. (On Rev. p. 109.) The witnesses are called the two prophets, who tormented them that dwell on the earth.—Rev. 11: 10. But who else answer so well to this description as do the faithful preachers of the Gospel? These (says the Revelator) are the two olive trees. This relates to Zech. 4: 3, 11–14. The two olive trees there are supposed to have been Joshua and Zerubbabel, who unitedly prefigured Christ; and who, Pool supposes, prefigured also the ambassadors of Christ. There (said the angel to Zechariah) are the two anointed ones (sons of oil, Heb.) that stand by the Lord of the whole earth. The gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit are represented by the anointing with oil. And the ascension-gifts of Christ to his ambassadors, for the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ, render ... for them to be called olive trees, or sons of oil. Thus reference appears to be had in the witnesses more immediately to the ministers of Christ.

But the witnesses are also the two candlesticks. A candlestick is a noted emblem of the church. 'The seven candlesticks which thou sawest, are the seven churches.' Rev. 1: 20. Doubtless the true members of Christ are not to be excluded from constituting the witnesses."—Dissertation on the prophecies, pp. 172–174.

... the "two witnesses?" Two ... testimony. ... Why said to ... witnesses constitute a complete ... They seem to be prophetic witnesses. They ... cause the Old and New Testament prophecies to "speak" or testify against a certain power which will so enrage the latter that it will make an effort and succeed, to a fearful extent, to cause these witnesses to be killed. To war then upon the witnesses will be to war on the Lamb. Whether other features may not more fully develop the dual number of these witnesses, is yet to be ascertained.

Now if we can find the power that kills, then we may more fully determine the time of their being killed. We have endeavored to show that the eighth head of the leopard beast, or the revived seventh, was the last wicked power with which the church would have to contend; and for further proof we remark that the beast in Rev. 17, is represented as having seven heads, and also there are seven kings. "'They are also seven kings,' (Cov.) 'They are seven kings,' (Newman.) 'And they are seven kings,' (Dou.) 'They are seven kings,' (Tyn)."—Berick's Grand Crisis, p. 357. "Five are fallen."—John sees this scenery in the wilderness state of the church. He was carried into the then future wilderness to mark more distinctly future events and the chronology of the same, precisely as Daniel was in vision carried down to the palace in Sushan, then future, to see the vision of the ram and goat, though he himself was still in Babylon. In this state John sees a beast having seven heads, a kind of double symbol, representing geographically, as well as politically, the condition of the woman which it carries. In this advanced position he says, "Five are fallen, one is," leaving only one more to arise to make up the seven. The sixth head of that leopard beast being Austria, as our brethren admit, then France was the seventh when Napoleon espoused the cause of the church, and answered well to the prediction in continuing but a "short space." The kings of Europe combined did wound the seventh head with the sword, and passed a decree that it should have no resurrection. But it rises at length,—the deadly wound is healed,—the beast revives, and all the world are wondering, while "they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is." With wonderful precision do we behold the Napoleonic dynasty, filling up this last scene of the prophetic drama.

We are informed that this eighth head, or the revived seventh head, ascends "OUT OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT;" "and (is the one that) goeth into perdition." Now in chap. 11: 7, we read concerning the two witnesses thus: "And when they shall have finished their testimony, the BEAST THAT ASCENDETH OUT OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT shall make war against them, and shall overcome them and kill them." Thus we learn that this last, or revived head of that scarlet beast, is the one that COMETH OUT OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT—is the one that kills the witnesses, does the same work that the two-horned beast was to do to those who receive not the "mark." And as the wounded head was not revived until Louis Napoleon seized upon the imperial crown, and cries, "The Empire is peace," it follows that the killing of the witnesses is an event subsequent to that eventful "2d of Dec." 1852, and will be accomplished ere this "head" goeth into perdition.

Summing up. 1st. The witnesses will have finished, or, as some render it, will be about to finish their testimony, when a power shall rise up and kill them.

2d. The power which kills them is a power that comes out of the bottomless pit, or abyss, therefore must have been thrown into that abyss of death, or darkness, before it could have come out.

3d. As the finishing up of the testimony of Christ will be the third angel's message—"If any man worship the beast or his image,"—it follows that the power here implicated will be the power which will kill them. And thus we read, Rev. 13: 15,—"And he (the two-horned beast) had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and cause as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed."

4th. As this image is a revived power, it well synchronizes with the revived head of the scarlet beast, Rev. 17, that "goeth into perdition."

5th. As the work of the beast from the bottomless pit is to kill the witnesses, and as the work of the two-horned beast is to kill the witnesses, it follows that they are one and the same power, their chronology being the same.

6th. As the eighth head of the scarlet beast is the beast that "ascendeth out of the bottomless pit," and as it is declared that the beast that "ascendeth out of the bottomless pit doth KILL the witnesses," then it follows that the eighth head will accomplish that work.

7th. Therefore, as we ... that we have proved that the revived Napoleonic dynasty is the eighth head of the scarlet beast—which did "ascend out of the bottomless pit," as the revelator declares—then it follows that that power will accomplish its work on the remnant who have the TESTIMONY of Jesus Christ.

May the Lord give us wisdom, that we may gain "the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name," and "stand on the sea of glass having the harps of God." More anon. H. ... ATT.

The New Volume.

Come, now, are you not glad to see this improvement? "Yes, but I am afraid the expenses wont be met." Well, what will you do towards it? "I would help if I had any money." Have you any influence? If so, you can get subscribers in two ways; first, if you are doing business with those that are favorable to the position we take, and are poor, help them some way to the paper. I have taken work of some, and wood of others, butter, cheese, grain, lumber, &c. With a little trouble, you can get a number of subscribers and help the paper, and the people that read it. It is not the paper as a paper we want to go, it is the light it carries.

VOL. IX. NO. 1. THE WORLD'S CRISIS.

For the Crisis.

Strong vs. Hudson.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF REFORM.

Dear Grant.—One of your correspondents inquires why no reply is made to the Review of my book in the Methodist Quarterly by Dr. Strong.—He seems to apprehend that evil will come if there is no rejoinder. I have no such apprehension. The religious papers, quite naturally, say the review is able; and the same thing is said of every review. But I have been among Methodist and other ministers a good deal, and have met more whose reading of the review has created a desire for the book, than I have seen of wavering minds confirmed by it in the orthodox view. And I have heard reviews, manifestly and confessedly abler than Dr. S.'s, spoken of in the most disparaging terms.

But those are not the only reasons why I make or desire no rejoinder. If your correspondent knows any one who is likely to be persuaded by the review that sin and woe are eternal, let him inform me, care of J. P. Jewett & Co., and I will write to the wavering one, pointing out the flaws, as they seem to me, of Dr. S.'s argument. But a regular reply given to the world would not accord with my philosophy. If such a reply were given, it might seem demanded to help the cause. But, as far as I recollect, Dr. S. makes only one point of argument not considered in the book; and I have no fear that a thinker will be persuaded by that. Again, there is no use in discussion unless readers think for themselves; and if the disputants were to travel through every detail of argument, what thinking would be left for the reader? And if the general character of the truer argument does not convince, and help the reader to finish some details, and even to correct some errors in the detail, better throw it aside and pray God to send some other champion.

But I have other reasons for declining further controversy over the same ground. Theologians are learning the wisdom of lawyers, who may dispute very hotly while the case is pending, and shake hands when the case goes to the jury. I have seen Dr. S., and though he may be firm as ever in the orthodox faith, he is not the man to worry if the jury bring in verdict against that burdensome faith. He is very gentlemanly and companionable, and, for a rarity, the tone of his review is not proscriptive.

And I meet a good many other divines who treat me very respectfully, and even helpfully. Not a week ago I called on a Methodist D. D. who was glad to take my work, and wished me "success in selling a good book." He did not think my doctrine true, but knew my discussions were valuable, and would recommend them to his pupils, as they should "prove all things."

Within about a week I have met three orthodox gentlemen—two of them ministers—who have patronized me by purchase, and then put horse before the sleigh to take me to the next man. I have met one orthodox theological professor who was very glad to see such a book; for there could be no worse evil than that people should hold doctrines, however true, in a traditional, dead way. And such a book would compel them to re-think the truth, and infuse the life and vigor of new thought into it.

Another orthodox professor and D. D. makes me his guest, and though he cannot get up a lecture for me among the students, he gives me "the liberty of the yard," and allows me to do what I can.

Another such becomes my host and introduces me personally to all the other professors, recommending me as likely to have made a book worth reading.

I meet others who have read my book, and insist on my tarrying and chatting as long as convenient. Some are wholly tolerant of the so-called heresy, and now and then I meet ministers who accept it as the truth. One orthodox minister lately bade me God speed, and hoped I might continue the discussion.

We would not hastily infer that many of these tolerant gentlemen actually agree with us. But many of them do feel the burdens of the received doctrine, and are perhaps entertaining the suspicion that it may be a great error.

Now my philosophy of reform is, not to fret about paltry details of argument—it makes me ache to meet a man boggled with questions about the consciousness or unconsciousness of the intermediate state, as if eternity rested on that corner stone—but to offer the great facts of the case, and thus set people a thinking. And if thinking is a safe business, no man need fear the result. Yours in Christ, C. F. H.

Correction.—In the last No. of the Crisis, there was an obituary of Sr. Mary Bradley of Kensington, Ct. It should read Sr. Mary Bradbury. She was the wife of [illegible] Bradbury. We bespeak for him, in this hour of affliction, and for his family, the prayers of the waiting ones. L. J. R.

For the Crisis.

Prophecy.—No. 1.

Bro. Grant.—In glancing over the columns of the last Crisis, I felt a desire to call the attention of the student of prophecy to the article from the pen of J. B. C. on "Symbols;" and although I would not vote the investigation of prophetic symbols, by writing over its portals the saying, "Fools presume where angels dare not tread," yet I do think with J. B. C. these "lofty themes" are treated with too much "recklessness;" and I sometimes think it is possible for writers on prophecy, like sectarians with their creeds, to come to the Bible WITH a theory rather than come FOR a theory; and in so doing, we shall be very likely to see things through colored glasses, and though convinced, yet,

"Convinced against our will,
Are of the same opinion still;"

and the result is, "confusion worse confounded."

These results might be remedied, perhaps, if we would more closely follow the example of those of Bible story,—Joseph, Daniel and John; Gen. 41: 15; Dan. 2: 18–28; also 9: 3; 10: 1, and onward; Rev. 1; 10, and, for our encouragement, the promised blessing, 3d verse. From these examples we may deduce the following rules:

1. Cease from our own wisdom.

2. Seek that wisdom that cometh from above, by earnest, humble prayer, with fasting.

3. Seek only the glory of God; remembering the foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of men.

4. Being "in the Spirit,"—enlightened by the Spirit, we shall be prepared to acknowledge, with those of old, "not unto us, not unto us, but unto him belongeth wisdom, and glory, and power." Amen.

Correspondence.

From J. T. Dixon.

Bro. Grant:—The truth is spreading rapidly in some parts of Rhode Island. Little churches of believers are being gathered (in gospel order) in many parts of this section—such as believe that evil and misery will entirely cease on this planet.

I believe the late discussion will have a tendency to induce people to read their Bibles more. The Lord will take care of the result. Do not be afraid of being ranked among Infidels. God knows his own. Let us be kind and gentle, and not imitate some, who, as Bro. D. T. Taylor says, when they write against us, seem to dip their pens in gall and wormwood.

In making these remarks, I am not influenced by unkind feelings. I respect many of our opponents who differ (honestly, no doubt) with us on the state of the dead, and finally impenitent. I think I am not so bigoted as to say I know we are right and they are wrong, for I might be mistaken, although I hope not fatally I know, too, that my Bible says none but meek ones can inherit the earth. I think in this I have the spirit of Christ, for I know that I love some of my old Baptist brethren in this town, who believe in eternal torment, because I believe them to be sincere Christians, and I can worship with them and love them. I am willing, too, that they should advocate every doctrine which they believe to be truth, if it is done in a kind and gentle spirit. Truth seeks the light, while error crouches in darkness. As for me, I grow stronger and stronger in the great truth that evil in this earth must cease to be, and I know of no Bible revelation which locates sinners in any other place.

This great truth is spreading far and near. Praise the Lord! How it disarms infidels, commending itself to every man's conscience. In this town, many of the good members of the Orthodox churches have embraced it. The pastor of one Freewill Baptist church, one of his deacons, and, I think, a majority of its leading members, believe and advocate it; and I am called nearly every Sunday, (also Bro. P. C. Rodman,) to labor among little churches, many just organized or organizing, within from eight to twenty miles of this place, east and west of the Providence and Stonington River Railroad. Our beloved Brn. Bellows and George Champlin, have been the long-tried pioneers who have contributed most largely in producing this blessed result. Bro. Hastings has been a powerful auxiliary also, not only by preaching, but mainly by the Tract operation; his books and tracts are scattered all over the State, and are doing much to open blind eyes. And our dear Bro. Blain, who I believe to be one of God's excellent ones, has removed much prejudice while here, by his kind way of presenting truth, visiting the clergy, circulating his tracts, and inducing them to purchase and read that valuable work of Bro. Hudson's.

I could tell you of many encouraging things about our missionary operations, but I see I am intruding on your limits. There is one I must mention, for they need help, and some preacher seeing this, may go to their assistance. At Caroline Mills, two Brn. hired a Freewill Baptist chapel (standing empty) last fall. It will seat some five hundred. They organized a little church of five. Bro. Bellows ordained Bro. Joseph Northrop, and the church elected him pastor. They have been, and are now, enjoying a revival spirit,—already number some thirty members, added by baptism and from other churches, and Sundays the house is full. I hope some good Bro. will soon visit them, as they need much instruction in the things of the kingdom.

God bless you, Bro. Grant, and sustain you in the arduous conflict; it will soon end, and then sweet rest will be yours. Amen. John T. Dixon.

Peacedale, R. I.

From Sr. E. J. C.

Bro. Grant:—I wish to write a few lines for the "Crisis," not because I can say something of consequence, but wish to add my hearty acknowledgement of what I consider "the truth as it is in Jesus." I became a believer in the pre-millennial advent of Christ in 1848, and soon after embraced the views advocated by you in the discussion with Dr. Litch. And my testimony is, that these truths are so clear, so beautiful, so glorious, that my heart burns within as I contemplate them, and wonder that more do not understand and embrace them.

I have carefully read the discussion, and can see no cause to regret my "heresy," if heresy it be, but am more confirmed, and that too by the arguments used to overthrow my faith. I cannot believe in a triune man, or acknowledge that necromancy is an unanswerable argument in favor of the immortality of the soul. Did the woman of Endor really bring the dead Samuel from his resting place to pronounce the doom of the guilty king of Israel, or was it the "jewel" man? and if the latter, how came that mantle upon him, and how could he tell the rejected man before him that on the morrow he and his sons should be with him? Would he indeed exchange mount Gilboa, and the armies of the Philistines, for the New Jerusalem above, and the spirits of just men made perfect? Well, I have commenced asking questions, and they would cover the paper all over, if I would let this pen go, but I really wish to ask a few more, and then stop.

Have you the shadow of an idea that our Savior referred to the death of a child when he said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," &c.? And what would a Chinese or Hindoo think, were they to hear it thus expounded, as I did not long since? Would they not be apt to think it rather favored their views? Such questions may shock some, and they certainly do me, but it is because I think all such scriptures are perverted, and I have never received any harm in consequence of looking a "fact" in the face.

We are coming to that point rapidly when we shall wish we had not shut our eyes, when something contrary to our beloved notion came before them. I may not possess much "logic,' but think I can see all sorts of wickedness growing from the doctrine of the natural immortality of man. E. J. C.

Obituary Notices.

Died, at her residence in Longmeadow, Mass., Rebecca Woolworth, wife of David Hale, aged seventy-six years.

In early life our mother became a follower of Jesus. For these many years we have enjoyed her faithful instructions. But now she rests, sweetly sleeping in Jesus.

She was ever steadfast, immovable, and rejoicing in that hope which purifieth. As she drew near the close of life, the promises of God in Christ became more precious than ever, believing that she should receive a new life at the second appearing of Jesus Christ, at which time she should receive the reward of the inheritance. She fully comprehended the great doctrine of the Gospel, and fell asleep in sweetest confidence of faith. S. H.

Died, of consumption, in West Hawley, Mass., Nov. 27th, Lorinda H. Beals, aged twenty-two years and two months.

Sr. Beals was a great sufferer, yet never was heard to murmur, but was perfectly resigned to her lot. She had a good hope through grace, which buoyed her up through her last sickness. She sleeps peacefully in the arms of the great Life-Giver, and when the bright morning of the resurrection shall burst in beams of brightness over the dark, cold grave, then will Lorinda wake from the tomb, come forth clothed with immortality, and live to die no more forever.

"So fades the lovely, blooming flower."

R.

Fell asleep, in Worcester, Mass., Feb. 17th, 1859, Bro. D. E. Moulton, aged 42 years.

Bro. M. died after a continued sickness of the consumption; which has been wearing him out for a long time, as many of the brethren know. He has suffered much, but now is at rest. As many of the brethren have been acquainted with him, having heard him preach, and knowing of his sickness through the Crisis, it will not be necessary to notice further, save that he died in hope of a resurrection and future life alone through Christ, to an eternal inheritance, in common with all the faithful and believing ones; which is to be given at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The funeral was attended by Bro. J. Hemenway. He has left a wife and three children, besides quite a circle of relatives and friends, to mourn his loss.

We expect to see him in a little from this, where consumption never will come. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!

New Orleans, Feb. 27th. The steamship Tennessee has arrived from Vera Cruz 22d inst.

Miramon was still at Orizaba, with 4000 men, and was collecting forced loans everywhere. He had formed a Cabinet, consisting of Larranzar, Minister of Foreign Relations; Zagaceta, Minister of Finance; and Castillo, Minister of War.

There were 4000 Liberal troops at Zacatecas, and another body at Morella.

The Progreso of the 16th states that the French and English commanders notified the captain of the American sloop-of-war Saratoga, that they should board the Tennessee, to see if any fillibusters were on board. The captain of the Saratoga intimated that they could not do so while his ship was near enough to prevent it.

The foreign ministers at the capital had not recognized Miramon as President.

The English and French squadrons were in a hostile attitude before Vera Cruz, and favoring Miramon and the Church party. They will attack the city from the sea, while Miramon does the same from the land side.

The English and French merchants at Vera Cruz have renounced the protection of their own flag, and placed themselves under the American flag.

FOREIGN.

The Liverpool Mercury of the 12th thus sums up the general English sentiment on the war question at the latest dates:

"At the present moment, uncertainty as to the future continues to prevail both here and on the continent; but habit has now enabled people to exist in this state of uncertainty without manifesting such lively emotion as heretofore. Doubt and distrust are still visible, but there is less alarm, and in this condition of society a spirit of hopefulness has a better chance of exhibiting and diffusing itself. A favorite opinion now is, that the Emperor Napoleon has really been checked in his purposes by the evident hostility of his own subjects to war, by the opposition of the British Government, and by the refusal of that Government to pledge itself to any policy respecting the future. They who hold this view now construe the Imperial speech of Monday as a pacific declaration, into which the more threatening and warlike passages were introduced to hide retrocession—as camp-fires are sometimes lighted to conceal a retreat. It is to be hoped that this is the correct reading. There is, however, the awkward fact of the warlike preparations of France to be accounted for. Perhaps the solution of these may be that the Emperor Napoleon looks upon armed diplomacy, as mendicants in Spain look upon armed begging, as the most efficacious. Another view is that the French Ruler is only waiting until discussion shall have produced, in France and England, a feeling more favorable or less hostile to his policy, or until the chapter of events shall have furnished him with a better pretext for war."

FRANCE.

The following is an extract from Count de Morny's speech, which was so enthusiastically applauded:

"Religion, philosophy, civilization, credit, industry, have all made of peace the first benefit of modern society. The blood of the people is no longer lightly shed; war is the last resource of rights disregarded and of honor offended. The greater number of difficulties is removed by diplomacy, or solved by pacific arbitrement. International communications so rapid and public have created a new European power, with which all governments are forced to account; that power is public opinion. It may for a moment be undecided or mistaken, but it always ends by siding with justice, with right, with humanity."

There is much talk of an autograph letter received by the Emperor from the King of Sardinia, in which the latter, after warmly thanking the Emperor for his sympathy with the Piedmontese nation, promises that Sardinia will abstain from any provoking or aggressive act towards Austria, and will calmly await the course of events, without seeking to precipitate them.

The number of ships-of-war now either armed or arming in different French ports is, by a recent estimate, stated not to be less than 200.

The most violent article which has been published on the subject of existing difficulties, appears in the "Siecle," which demands war, not in the cause of Italian independence, but for the purpose of obtaining the annulment of treaties, the existence of which perpetuates the recollection of the greatest disaster of France, and which were signed under the oppression of 1,200,000 foreign soldiers.

The Paris correspondent of the Times gives the following opinion of a well-informed person in regard to the rumored willingness of Austria to evacuate the Roman States:

"This evacuation, he says, is precisely what would suit the Emperor of the French, whose plans would be promoted by an insurrection in Italy. Now, so long as his troops are at Rome, the Emperor would be obliged to put down a seditious movement on one point which he would see with secret pleasure break out in Lombardy. Austria has motives of quite a contrary kind to remain in the Roman States. To quit them would be to fall blindly into a snare. She will perhaps appear to lend herself to negotiations on this point, but, as I have already said, only to gain time."

AUSTRIA.

In the opinion of military men at Vienna, the assertion of the Paris Constitutionnel that France could send 400,000 or 500,000 men across her frontier is a great exaggeration.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times can come to no other conclusion than that Austria is prepared for war. The Austrian army at present consists of 450,000 men of all arms, and in case of need it could be raised to 600,000 men.

The Austrian government continues its military preparations, by recalling soldiers on furlough, purchasing horses and stores, and casting artillery.

Still, the Austrian Gazette says that France has given to the English Minister a positive promise not to attack Austria if Sardinia is not interfered with, and that Austria has not the slightest intention of attacking Sardinia.

A letter from Munich reports that positive assurances have been received at Vienna from Prussia, that that power would regard an attack by France upon the Austrian frontier as a distinct casus belli.

ITALY.

The following is an extract from a letter from Genoa, dated the 8th:—

"The pamphlet Napoleon III and Italy, and the Emperor's speech, are the subjects of conversation in every circle. These two documents have produced a very favorable impression on all who trouble themselves with politics. All parties, all governments, and all interests now see that an Italian question exists, and that is sufficient for us, as it is now evident that Italy must perish or the question must be settled."

The Times' correspondent at Turin says the Emperor's speech has given decided satisfaction there. It is regarded as warlike, but it is natural the Italians should interpret it according to their wishes. Surprise is felt at the backwardness of England in the cause of Italian nationality. Apprehension is felt at the influence which a desire to preserve the English alliance may have on the Emperor of the French. It is certain that warlike preparations continue; but who is to begin?

Private letters from Palermo bring intelligence that the country is as agitated now as as it was in 1847, and that things are taking much the same turn. A great number of arrests of persons of station and education have taken place in that city.

A letter from Modena, in the official Gazette of Milan, says: "Important reforms are spoken of here, and among them are the revision of the commercial code, the establishment of a tribunal of commerce, the nomination of a new minister for agriculture and commerce, the foundation of a discount bank," &c.

RUSSIA.

The Nord of Brussels says: "A letter from St. Petersburg mentions a rumor which, if it turn out to be true, will prove that the government has resolved to enter on the path of religious toleration. The rumor is that the establishment of a synagogue in the capital, where heretofore Jews have only been allowed to reside under very severe restrictions, is about to be authorized.

The concentration of the Russian army on the frontier of Gallicia has been repeatedly contradicted. The Augsburg Gazette declares, however, that the fact is beyond doubt, and that the Emperor Alexander has ordered a general armament.

JEDDAH.

A letter from Jeddah states that the execution, already mentioned, of the criminals concerned in the massacre of the Christians in that city, took place in the middle of the day, and in the most public manner possible. Their heads were cut off at the foot of the kiosque, from which the orders for the massacre were issued. The inhabitants were struck with stupor, and for the most part remained shut up in their houses. The event has produced considerable sensation among them, and they now feel convinced that neither rank, station nor riches will henceforth protect those who are led away by their fanaticism to the commission of such crimes.

Determination.—"The longer I live," says Sir T. F. Buxton, "the more I am certain that the great difference between the feeble and the powerful, the great and the insignificant—is energy, invincible determination, a purpose once fixed, and then death or victory. That quality will do anything than can be done in the world; and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunities, will make a two-legged creature a man without it."

Slander.—Slander never yet did a real injury to any man. Men are injured by evils done by themselves, not by the malignant efforts of others. Spare your pity for those who do evil. They who suffer evil, but firmly trust in God, do not need it.

☞ There is nothing worth having that is not difficult. My life, and, I suppose, the life of every man who has worked with hand or head, has been one long contest with difficulties, and none of us would be the men we now are, if we had tamely allowed difficulties to conquer us.

☞ Be contented and thankful; a contented spirit makes labor light, sleep sweet, and all around cheerful.

Rome as it Was; Rome as it is Not; Rome as it is.—No. 4.

BY ELDER S. S. BREWER.

A few thoughts more concerning the leopard beast—its seven heads and ten horns. The ten horns were received by transfer from the dragon; namely, the Huns, who came up in A. D. 356; Ostrogoths, 377; Visigoths, 378; Franks, 407; Vandals, 407; Sueves and Alans, 407; Burgundians, 407; Heruli, 476; Saxons, 476; and the Lombards, in the north of Germany, 483.

THE SEVEN HEADS.—First, the Greek; second, Franks; third, Saxons; fourth, the Imperial House of Franconia; fifth, the Imperial House of Swabia; sixth, Spain; seventh, Austria.

Now, dear reader, do I claim too much for history and facts, when I state that they have proved there have been seven imperial, [illegible] seven ruling HEADS in Europe since the [illegible] that Romulus Augustulus did trans[illegible] we find seat, power and authority to the [illegible] Emperor Zeno, A. D. 475? Did that bond of union, or did that dread of the papal supremacy lose its hold on the powers of Europe during the French revolution? It did. Hear the Hon. Gerard Noel speak:

"Can the overthrow of the monastic orders, plunder of the church property, the destruction of religion by legislative enactment, and the massacre of a hundred thousand of her clergy, be consistent with any reasonable estimate of domination and power? Under such terrific judgment upon the persecutor, can we refuse to admit that the period of the twelve hundred and sixty years has terminated its course? And should the blow already given to the Papal power be correctly deemed incompatible with its long established domination, then is the probability even great, that within the limit of another generation, 'the Sign of the Son of Man may appear in the heavens,' and the redemption of his church be revealed."—Literalist, No. 3, 1840.

The following testimony by Geo. Bush Prof. of Hebrew in the New York City University, shows the hatred of the French government, under Napoleon, to the papacy:

"Certain it is, that the philosophic mind of this age is forming a continually heightening estimate of the stupendous importance of that series of revolutions which, commencing in France in 1789, has, in its progress, so completely transformed the face of Europe. Nearly all the governments of [illegible] constituting the ten Kingdoms [illegible] of ROMAN EARTH have subverted, and [illegible] Papal Power, as a secular sovereignty, [illegible] fact degraded and extinguished.

[illegible] During the twenty-five years of its progress," says Mr. Alison, "the world has [illegible] through more than five hundred years [illegible] its ordinary existence." "The pillage of the papal States, by the French, in 1797," says Mr. Bickersteth, "was such as to drain them of its specie, and to take away all the jewels and precious stones they could find. The French ambassador wrote to Napoleon, stating, discontent is at its highest in the Papal States."

[illegible] see no other power predicted in Holy [illegible] be raised up to destroy the mother of harlots, but that in Rev. 17: 16. Please mark that, in connection with Dan. 7: 26th and 11th verses. The ten horns of the scarlet or red wild beast are the same as the ten toes of the metallic image of Dan. 2: 42–44. Three of the ten horns of the leopard beast were plucked up, leaving but seven remaining on the leopard beast. But there are ten horns or kings identified with the red beast, when the judgments of God overtake the harlot power. Please read Rev. 17: 16, 17.

I will now present an illustration, to simplify this very interesting subject; as "all Scripture, given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction and instruction."

THE LEOPARD BEAST.	THE SCARLET BEAST.
"And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy."	"So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition."
THE SEVEN HEADS: Greek, Franks, Saxons, Imperial house of Franconia, Imperial house of Swabia, Spain, Austria.	THE SEVEN HEADS of Rome Pagan: Regal, Dictators, Prætors, Consulate, Triumvirate, Imperial, Patrician, Roman Catholicism.

[illegible] horns are to hate the harlot—this [illegible] declaration of Almighty God—and [illegible] with fire. John Mitchel, in a [illegible] to Archbishop Hughes, makes [illegible] remark:—"But I undertook [illegible] that the pope, as a prince, [illegible] and his government a mis[illegible] ment." "To most persons [illegible] intense hatred of Ro[illegible] government would be proof [illegible] they fought till their [illegible] to be rid of it, [illegible] it has needed all [illegible] foreigners,) and [illegible] sides, to thrust [illegible]." "We [illegible] nature of [illegible] that they may learn to regard it with UTTER EXECRATION as one of the worst and meanest DESPOTISMS that now deform Europe."

Another writer observes;—"Nine tenths of the Roman people, including the female portion of the population, look on the pope and his cardinals with contempt, as spiritual impostors, and with the utmost hatred and horror, AS TEMPORAL OPPRESSORS." And from what he saw and heard in Rome, he is "convinced that within twenty-four hours after the withdrawal of the foreign garrison, the pope's government will have fallen, and his own life, together with the cardinals and counsellors, will have been sacrificed, unless they can save themselves by flight or concealment, which will be very difficult; for every avenue of escape is noted and watched." Said Padre Gavazzi, once a Roman Catholic Dr. of divinity,—"Between Christ and the pope there is a sword, and a sword forever. Luther was a Reformer; I am an Exterminator." This is but a tithe of the testimonies I have in my possession on this point.

Who ever has read the article, The Pope weeps, and another, The Pope is dead, published in the N. Y. Evangelist, 1849, could not fail to see the hatred to the harlot. Here is a Roman manifesto:

"The following soul-stirring manifesto has just been issued from the down-trodden sons of Italy:—

'First, therefore, we demand friendship and fellowship with all the nations of the earth.

Second. That Italy belongs to Italians.

Third. That Italy be one and indivisible, and under a single government of liberal form.

Fourth. That the fundamental laws of Italy guaranty:

1st. Equal rights at law.

2d. Independence of general from local administration.

3d. Personal liberty.

5th. Inviolability of domicil, and of the privacy of letters.

5th. Inviolability of possessions and property.

6th. Liberty of conscience.

7th. Liberty of the press.

8th. Liberty of public speaking and convention.

9th. Responsibility of the Ministry—and,

10th. The institution of a national Guard.

As to the peculiar form of government, Italians will regulate this question, as they will, also, the personnel thereof, in good time. Let the Popes return to their nets, let them fish for souls for the skies, and cease to tyrannize over the body.

Our course is taken; the war in Spain, the burning of Moscow, with their episodes, are before our minds.

We will reduce our most superb cities to ashes, with our celebrated monuments. We will devastate our fertile plains, and leave behind us but the vestiges of destruction and extermination.

Without distinction of age, sex, or social position, all, all, shall be soldiers—we will come with every kind of weapon, and rush with furious desperation upon the Vandals who dare to invade our boundaries, and to trample under foot the most sacred rights of man.

Mountains of corpses shall rise above the mountains, torrents of blood shall run through our plains.

Then, indeed, shall Italy call herself "the land of the dead;" but the dead shall not all be Italians. Whosoever shall visit our fields of battle, will see with surprise that around each dead Italian there lie at least more dead strangers.

It will be as they would have it.'"

Thus we have Rome as it was, as it was not, and as it yet is.

There is one more fatal objection in trying to make the Napoleonic Dynasty the eighth head. There was to be an agreement with the ten horns and the beast, whoever it is. "These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast. For God hath put into their hearts to fulfill his will, and to agree and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled." See Rev. 17: 13–17. Now what are the facts concerning Napoleon? Did the kingdoms on the peninsula of Italy agree and give their kingdoms to Napoleon I., the uncle? No. Some of his bloodiest feats were performed in Italy. It may be argued that they will give their power to Napoleon III. It may do for some persons to speculate with such an idea; and if ever a coalition should take place, it could not fill the mould of prophecy; for I have shown, by the same parity of reasoning that some employ, there would have been ten heads—two too many. The political institutions of Europe are too complicated for any one but an inspired legate from heaven to divine what the governments of earth will or will not do.

About one year since I was told that the Spiritualists would supplant the government of our nation. If I should judge from present appearances, there are less hopes, this very day, of their maintaining the numbers and influence they then had in communities, than there were one year previous; and as their numbers, in every community, where I am acquainted, are lessening, and two thirds of their numbers are females, I do not think they would ever be very formidable opponents in a battle-field. This is only my opinion. The probability is, such persons would rather listen to the rattling of tables and chairs, in a close room, than the booming of cannons and the rattling of musketry on the unprotected field of blood.

One word more. What will be done? In 1848 thousands predicted, when the thrones of Europe were tottering and falling, Republicanism would become the ruling principle in Europe. Alas! like all human speculations, the gourd has withered, and kingcraft will remain until they cry for rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb. But let all human conjectures pass for what they are worth.

In conclusion, I would say that I have written the above from a sense of duty to the cause of God, which, above all others, lies nearest my heart. And, dear reader, let me exhort you to prepare for the coming of Jesus. All things bespeak that event as very near. The condition of Rome, once the mistress of the world in its pagan form of government, and then in the eighth form, under the Roman Pontiff, the master of kings, emperors and potentates of Europe; once the cruelest machine of Satanic bigotry and intolerance, with garments gory with the blood of fifty millions of martyrs; once supported by the kings of the Roman earth, now forsaken, despised, hated, and millions ready to consummate their vengeance on the beast and his rider, when the words of God are fulfilled. Truly, the mould of prophecy concerning Rome is complete, excepting the 8th verse of Rev. 18.—"Therefore shall her plagues come in one day; death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire. For strong is the Lord God who judgeth her." Prepare to meet thy God! Amen.

LINES.

We sing of the kingdom of God,
Of its peace and its purity, where
We may walk in that city abroad,—
While singing we long to be there.

There are homes for the homeless, and rest
For the weary our songs do declare,—
A balm for the sorrow-sick breast;
Then who would not long to be there!

Bright eyes shall ne'er fill with sad tears,
Nor wailings be borne on the air;
The soul ne'er grows weary with years,—
O, who would not long to be there!

There friends shall again never part,
Nor our homes ever dim be with care,
We hear it, and then from the heart,
With sighings, we long to be there.

With cherub and seraph above,
In a song all our bliss we'll declare,
Safe, safe in the city of love,
No more must we long to be there.

No more shall we mourn for the dead,
Nor the long-faded hopes of the fair,
For bright gems shall adorn every head
There reigning,—I long to be there!

Charity.—No. 2.

This grace is above the gift of knowledge. "Though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."—1 Cor. 13: 2. Satan himself has great knowledge, even in the mysteries and knowledge of divine revelation; yet he is a fiend, because he is destitute of supreme love to God, and universal good will to the universe of intelligences. "Woe to the inheritors of the earth and the sea; for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." And as "satan himself is transformed into an angel of light, therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness, and "into the apostles of Christ."

Balaam was a man noted for his prophetic wisdom. How sublime and beautiful were his prophetic declarations, when from "the top of the rocks" he saw the visions of the Almighty respecting Israel,—"his King," and "his kingdom," which "shall be exalted." But he was externally selfish, "loving the wages of unrighteousness." Therefore we despise the man, while we admire his prophecies, and especially when we see him secretly counselling and advising "Balak to cast a stumbling-block before Israel," "in the matter of Baal-Peor," which resulted in the dreadful destruction of thousands of his fellow men, of both nations, by plague and war! And we feel that it was, in some measure, a just retribution upon him, when he fell upon the field of battle with the slain, while fighting against the very people he could not curse; though previous to this he had offered up the sincere and humble prayer: "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Knowledge and mental endowments, without charity, cannot secure to their possessor a virtuous superiority among men, or the favor of God. Lord Chesterfield, Lord Bacon, Lord Byron, Rosseau, Voltaire, and hundreds of others we might name, were men of great ability, and whom the world will esteem for their wisdom and knowledge, but they will forever despise them in heart because destitute of that love which would have made them the benefactors of their race, in time and eternity. Moses, Joseph, Samuel, David, Daniel, the apostles of our Lord, Wickliffe, Luther, Sir Isaac Newton, Wesley, Whitefield, &c., &c., were men who will be esteemed throughout time, and honored in "the world to come" with "the crown of righteousness," because they were men possessing both knowledge and charity.

The apostle Peter instructs us to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

"The Great Question."

BY JOHN HOWELL.

There are several things essential to constitute a question great, to which we will for a few moments invite attention.

First—The subject it sets forth. If there is no importance to be attached to the subject, then the question which proposes it dwindles into insignificance. It would be only worthy of silent neglect, or at most a reply sufficient to express its folly, and develop the ignorance of its author.

Secondly—Whatever is dependent upon the truth or falsity of the subject involved in the question, has an important bearing upon its greatness. If nothing depends upon it, then the question may as well be dismissed, for its discussion would avail nothing. If much depends upon it, either for good or evil, then develop it, expose its fallacy, if it exists, and if otherwise it is true, cause its truth to shine forth.

Thirdly—The amount of practical good secured by the agitation of a question, goes far to determine its greatness. If there is none, then the question is positively useless. If evil is its uniform result, then its agitation should be relinquished by the good; and if those who are evil-minded persist in publishing it, then if the evil is sufficient to demand reproof and exposure, let all who love the light, stand forth with a spirit of kindness, and firmly resist the evil, and expose its origin. If, however, the good is apparent in its influence upon the public mind, and that good is essential to, and productive of, the christian character, then let it be agitated with a zeal and interest worthy of the importance of such a question, and more especially if it constitutes the only permanent safeguard against the perils of these last days, and the soul-damning error of this time—Spiritualism.

Fourthly—The bearing a question has upon other questions of known truth, increases or lessens its greatness. If injurious to them by detracting from their real importance or truthfulness, then the question should be suspended, yea, removed. If, however, it should be essential to their harmony, and by its relation to them, it should increase their importance and express their real value, then preach it, publish it, discuss it, long and loud, if need be, and never be influenced for a single moment by the cry of "Non-essential." The question may be non-essential to the interests of sectarianism, but not to the system of truth which originates it. Indeed, it may be "the great question," when considered in its relation to the great system of truth, but a very small question when contemplated in its relation to sectarianism, because of its great unpopularity.

Fifthly—If the question is one of divine revelation, then it is most certainly great, and especially if it affects the future destiny of man, and exhibits the equity of the divine government. God would not reveal a truth which is not essential to the completion and harmony of his revelation, or the benefit of the race for whom he revealed it. The voice of inspiration saith: "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope." "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, (margin, perfected,) thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—Rom. 15: 4; 1 Tim. 3: 16, 17. In these scriptures we discover the origin, design, and profit of the word of God, and that this design and profit is proposed and secured by the whole. Great importance is attached to the whole word of God, and in no instance does it ever insinuate that it is non-essential. The word of God is a revelation of great questions or things, each sustaining a relation to the other, and the whole the great future. Therefore, any question which it proposes for our consideration, respecting the condition and destiny of our race, subsequent to the present state, is "the great question." From no other source than the precious Bible, can we obtain any reliable information whatever, respecting man' future destiny and condition, and that event, the clear development of which required a revelation from God, must be a great event, otherwise God has employed his power to reveal the future, in the development of trivial matters.

In consideration of the above, let us examine carefully a few points, and endeavor to determine whether the question of the unconscious state of the dead, and future destruction of the wicked, is, "the great question."

I. Our first proof of this is derived from the object for which God sent his Son Jesus into the world. Observe John 3: 16. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "Perish," in this scripture, expresses a condition exactly opposite to "life," otherwise the antithesis is not complete, and in the absence of every text to express a partial one, we affirm that an opposite extreme from "life" is suggested by the text, and therefore death. Again: "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might LIVE through him."—1 John, 4: 9. Again, said Jesus: "For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. . . . . . And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day."—John 6: 38, 40. What language could more clearly express the design of God in sending Jesus into the world, than the above? He certainly did not come to confer upon man the present life, for man possessed this before he came. No! It was the future life, that is, life in a future state, subsequent to the life we now live. Did God send his Son to confer a blessing upon man, which he already possessed? If so, how did God manifest his love toward man? And if God could not have manifested his love toward man in sending his Son, that man might have eternal life if he possessed eternal life by creation, then why propose the gift of eternal life as the object for which he sent his Son? O, what dishonor that lie of the devil, "Thou shalt not surely die," cast upon God, the author and source of all life. How it detracts from the wisdom of God, so perfectly apparent in every part of the plan of redemption. Charging, as it does, upon God the folly of giving his Son, yea, only Son, to die, that man might live, when, if the devil told the truth, man has eternal life, whether Christ came or not. But, notwithstanding man may be dependent upon the gift of Christ for eternal life, it may be asked, what bearing this has upon the unconsciousness of the dead? We reply: "Much every way; but chiefly, because" of the time when this life is to be conferred. According to the New Testament, this will not be done until Christ comes the second time.—Rom. 2: 6, 7; Matt. 16: 27; Rev. 22: 12, et al. Now, then, if man loses his present life and is buried, and at the second advent, and not before, receives eternal life, what life has he between these two lives? The scriptures nowhere speak of another life, or an intermediate life. The only reply is, that man is unconscious in death, hence "knows not anything."

II. The necessity of the gift of Christ by the Father to confer eternal life upon man. In the first place, in so far as the necessity existed for man to have life eternal conferred upon him, in order to perpetuate his being eternally, it was necessary for God to manifest his love toward man by the gift of Christ, in order to secure the blessing. Were not this the case, God would not have declared by the apostle John, or rather Jesus, as recorded by John, that the necessity for the gift of his Son, by which he manifested his love, is, "that whosoever believeth IN HIM should not perish, but have everlasting life. The necessity is further proved by the crucifixion of Christ. Observe John 3: 14, 15—"And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that WHOSOEVER believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." Was there any necessity of Moses lifting up the serpent in the wilderness? Certainly! What was that necessity? To perpetuate life. The life of whom? Of men, the Israelites. For what MUST the Son of man be lifted up? To confer upon the believer only eternal life. Was there any necessity of it? Yes, for otherwise he, man, must "perish." If, then, eternal life is ever to be given as the result of the gift of Christ to the world, and as the accomplishment of the promise of God to men, that life is in no sense INHERENT, and if the blessing of life is to be conferred upon a condition, only such as comply with it will possess eternal life. If the life of one man continues eternally, notwithstanding the event of death, how is it possible for Christ to give him eternal life? And if that man possesses eternal life independent of Christ, then there was not a universal necessity for God, however much he might love the world, to send Christ to confer that life, through faith in Christ, upon all mankind.

Again, Jesus said, as above quoted, that he "came down from heaven to do the will of him that sent him." And that the Father's will is that the believer may have everlasting life, and be raised at the last day. Read John 6: 38, 40. And did God will a thing which was unnecessary, and also impossible for him or his Son to accomplish? If man is alive when buried in his grave, and lives forever by virtue of his creation, he certainly did. Living men are not the subjects of the resurrection, and those who live forever without Christ, were it possible, they would live in opposition to the will of God, and be not a part of the world.

III. Another point in proof that this is "the great question," is apparent from the relation which man sustains to the blessing of life which it proposes. This relation is one of absolute dependence. We have more than hinted at this in the previous point which we have examined. The Scriptures invariably contemplate man when out of Christ as opposed to "wrath," to "destruction," to "utterly perish," to a loss of "life" and a loss of "himself," and repeatedly presents the fact that, both by a figure of speech and otherwise, their "end is to be burned." There is not an instance on record, nay, not one plain declaration in the Bible that, independent of Christ in any sense, man shall or ever can live forever. Christ is absolutely the great Life-Giver, and separated from him we are as the branch, "withered," "gathered," "cast into the fire," and "are burned."—Jno. 15: 1–7; Heb. 6: 4–8. If then our relation to the blessing of life be one of absolute dependence upon a Life-Giver, how can we possibly live in any sense after this present life terminates, unless the Life-Giver shall confer another life? Can it be possible that the wicked are in a better situation with reference to future life than even the righteous? If there be no resurrection, "then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."—1 Cor. 15: 18. A resurrection is the only event that can confer life in the future even upon those who are in Christ. Where then will the wicked obtain his eternal life? Ah, the word of God declares that he shall be raised from the dead, but to experience "damnation," to "reap corruption."—Gal. 6: 7, 8. O, let us render unto Jesus the things that are Jesus', and unto Adam the first, the things that are Adam's. Adam has conferred upon us death, with all its train of afflictive circumstances; but Jesus "the Lord from heaven," the "second Adam a quickening spirit," confers life, ETERNAL LIFE, and requires his servants to publish it, however unpopular it may be. It is indeed the gospel message to a judgment-bound and death-doomed world.

Selections.

Selected for the Crisis.

THE GOOD WE MIGHT DO.

We all might do good,
When we often do ill,
There is always the way,
If we have but the will;
Though it be but a word
Kindly breathed or suppressed,
It may guard off some pain,
Or give peace to some breast.

We all might do good
In a thousand small ways—
In forbearing to flatter,
Yet yielding due praise—
In spurning ill humor,
Reproving wrong done,
And treating but kindly
Each heart we have won.

We all might do good,
Whether lowly or great,
For the deed is not gauged
By the purse or estate;
If it be but a cup
Of cold water that's given,
Like "the widow's two mites,"
It is something for heaven.

A Grain of Musk.

BY A. J. H.

I dropped a single grain of musk
A moment in my room;
When years rolled by, the chamber still
Retained the same perfume.
So every deed approved of God,
Where'er its lot be cast,
Leaves some good influence behind
That shall forever last.

How to Study the Bible.

Even for the scholar, we believe the text, with the usual apparatus for studying any language, is its own best comment. For general readers, a really true and faithful translation is better than all notes and comments. And a mind truly honest, willing to receive light, a heart panting for God and spiritual good, a soul hungering and thirsting for righteousness, can take the Bible in any respectable version, and find all its own wants met and satisfied; can, if it has a gift or feels a call, go to its fellow-beings with a power and efficacy that will be sought in vain from critical and exegetical apparatus. It is one of the illusions of young ministers, and still oftener of Sunday-school teachers, that they can find in books the material they want for the elucidation of the Bible and the instruction of hearers and pupils; and no illusion is more completely and rapidly dispelled than this, when the actual trial comes. The books are found to be dry and husky, beating ever about the bush, but missing the bird. The minds of hearers, and above all of children, will not respond to any such bringings forth. The sermons and the lessons partake of their source, and drop dead on dull ears. But when pastors and teachers kindle their own souls at the fire of God's altar, fill their own minds with the dear, sparkling truth of the Bible, their hearts with its faith, hope and charity, and have the word hidden in their souls, and glowing there, they find that their speech partakes of the glow and fervor of the divine Word, they see its meaning, and testify as those who have seen and do know.

A Constant Miracle.

The Bible itself is a standing and an astonishing miracle. Written, fragment by fragment, throughout the course of fifteen centuries, under different states of society and in different languages, by persons of the most opposite tempers, talents, and conditions, learned and unlearned, prince and peasant, bond and free; cast into every form of instructive composition and good writing, history, prophecy, poetry, allegory, emblematic representation, judicious interpretation, literal statement, precept, example, proverbs, disquisition, epistle, sermon, prayer; in short, all rational shapes of human discourse, and treating, moreover, on subjects not obvious, but most difficult, its authors are not found, like other writers, contradicting one another upon the most ordinary matters of fact and opinion, but are at harmony upon the whole of their sublime and momentous scheme.—Prof. Maclagan.

The Church of Christ.

The Church of Christ should not have ranks, and grades, and priests—all are priests; it should not have a proud hierarchy to whom the poor man dare not go—governors it may have, but no "lords over God's heritage." It should be a church, not of clergy, but for and of the people, in which every man should be worth as much as every other man, if not for his acquirements, at least, for his humanity; in which, however poor or ignorant a man may be, it should be remembered that he brought at least one precious offering to God's altar—a heart to be purified, a soul to be made devout, an intellect to be enlightened;—that he brought one more worshiper for God, and one more lover for man. We want then a Church in which there should be freedom, unity, and Christian equality. —George Dawson.

Non-Immortality of the Soul.

Luther thus ironically responded to the decree of the Council of the Lateran, held during the Pontificate of Pope Leo:—"I permit the Pope to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful,—such as the soul is the substantial form of the human body,—the soul is immortal,—with all those monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman dunghill of decretals; that such as his faith is, such may be his gospel, such his disciples, and such his church, that the mouth may have meat suitable for it, and the dish a cover worthy of it." The belief of Luther is plainly expressed in these words, on the doctrine of the soul's immortality; it is evident that he refused to acknowledge this doctrine. The philosophy of Luther led him to conceive of the human soul as a distinct, but not an immortal, subsistence. The soul, he imagined, was separated from the body in death; but he did not believe in its continued consciousness between death and resurrection. He embraced and taught the doctrine of the sleep of the soul, and continued in that belief to the close of his life.

The prominence given by Luther to the doctrines of the non-immortality of the soul, and its unconsciousness in death, induced Sir Thomas More to publish a work in reply, objecting to the views advocated by the Reformer. This reply of More's called another distinguished witness into the arena of controversy, William Tyndale, the translator:—"In putting departed souls in heaven, hell, and purgatory," says Tyndale, "you destroy the arguments wherewith Christ and Paul prove the resurrection. What God doth with them, that shall we know when we come to them. The true faith putteth the resurrection, which we be warned to look for every hour. The heathen philosophers denying that, did put that the souls did ever live. And the Pope joineth the spiritual doctrine of Christ, and the fleshly doctrine of philosophers together,—things so contrary that they cannot agree. . . . . And because the fleshly-minded Pope consenteth unto heathen doctrine, therefore he corrupteth the scriptures to establish it. . . . If the souls be in heaven, tell me why they be not in as good case as the angels be? And then what cause is there of the resurrection?"

Sir Thomas More asked,—"What shall he care, how long he live in sin that believeth Luther, that he shall after this life feel neither good nor evil in body nor soul, until the day of doom?" To which Tyndale replied,—"Christ and his apostles taught no other, but warned to look for Christ's coming again every hour: which coming again, because ye believe will never be, therefore have ye feigned that other merchandize."

The above quotations prove that the present popular doctrines of the immortality of the soul, and a state of conscious life between death and the resurrection, were not doctrines held by Luther and Tyndale. Luther calls them "monstrous opinions," and Tyndale declares that they were "heathen" and "fleshy doctrines," and subversive of the scripture doctrines of Christ's second coming, and the resurrection from the dead.—Panton Ham.

THE WORLDLING'S GOD.—Who would part with his God? I will part with my life rather than with my God. No wonder then that the covetous man so hugs his gold; it is his god. If you take that from him, he may cry with Micah, when he lost his God, "What have I more?" His heaven is gone, his happiness is gone; his all is gone, if God be gone: I will not therefore wonder so much at the closeness of his hand, as at the vainness of his heart. We count it singular wisdom, to keep that God we choose: but that is absolute folly, to choose that God we cannot keep.

My Labors East.

BRO. GRANT:—Though my cares are many, I will take time to give one incident in my labors East, last season, but must be brief. Having lectured twice in Pawtucket, R. I., where my brother, a Baptist minister, resides, and a number having embraced our views, I was solicited, on a second visit to the place, to give more lectures. But I thought it would be best to get up a discussion with the Universalist minister, having heard he was a candid and honorable man. He readily agreed to my proposal, and the following notice was given in the paper there, and by hand-bills:

A DISCUSSION will be held in Pawtucket, on the final results of the Divine Government, between Rev. Mr. Goodrich and Rev. Jacob Blain of Buffalo, N. Y.,—one affirming the final salvation of all mankind, and the other the literal destruction of the wicked.

The debate will commence on Monday evening, Dec. 27th, at 8 o'clock, in Social Hall, in Pawtucket, to be continued on other evenings, as may be agreed on by the parties.

Admission five cents, to pay for hall, notices, &c.

We agreed to keep party feelings down, and also to give a share of our time in showing that endless torment was not true, and that the only legitimate argument was between our views. Our plan succeeded beyond my hopes, as the first night the hall was filled half an hour before the time, and half had to leave. The second night we procured a larger hall, which was also filled. The third night a heavy snow storm reduced the number to about one hundred, and rendered it best to close for the present. The admittance fee paid for halls and notices, and $5 over, for which I gave out my tracts, so that three hundred new readers or families were supplied.

My friend opened, and I answered his texts in classes, as follows: His first and strongest class were the ten, as seen in Death not Life, page 21, which show that the universe is to be cleansed from sin and woe, and finally "every creature give glory to God," as seen in Rev. 5: 13. This class I soon removed by the views—that when "the last enemy shall be destroyed," and "be as though they had not been," then indeed "every knee shall bow," &c. Here I took time to show that the so-called Orthodox could not meet restorationists on this class of texts, and I trust many present saw it

Their strong text—"restitution of all things"—I showed must be limited, by explaining texts in the 37th Psalm; and by the fact that, if unlimited, then snakes and toads, swine, grass-hoppers, whales, &c., must all be restored; and as there are many millions of animals to one man, the earth could not contain them.

The next class of passages produced are more numerous—as, "Christ tasted death for every man"—"taketh away the sin of the world"—"God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them;" and others like these. See fifteen quoted in my work, p. 105. This class of texts, which form their main argument, I met by a similitude, illustrative of the atonement.

Suppose a king and an only son reign over an empire, and have a law that every rebel must die. A province rebels, and all are guilty, and can be subdued and slain; but the king and his son love and wish to save them from death. ("God so loved the world," &c.) But the law is a bar—if one rebel be pardoned absolutely, or without satisfaction to the law, or "its being magnified and made honorable," then all must be, and so all laws are dead or void. Out of love to the rebels, the son agrees to go among the rebels, (unknown to them,) and obey the broken law, knowing that he will be put to death by them, on condition that the father will raise him from the dead, (supposing it possible.) The son goes, and suffers and dies—the father raises, and brings him to his throne—proclamation is made by the father—"I have laid the iniquities of you all on my son," and my law will be honored though I pardon all—your pardon is offered to all, on condition that each one swears allegiance, and become reconciled to my government." In such a case it can be plainly seen that it would be unwise and useless to pardon while rebellion still rankled in the heart. And here the necessity of gospel repentance can be seen. Suppose some such rebels swear allegiance, &c., but others, through pride or love of rebellion, refuse to do so; then, of course, the law is still in force against them, and they must die, and die justly. And though some should die, still the king might say with propriety, "my son has tasted death for every man"—"he is the savior of the whole province," (the world,)—"he is the Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world," (the province.) It might also be said, "the Father was in the Son, reconciling the province (world) unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," although all did not become reconciled. I showed that stubborn facts proved that all did not become "reconciled" in this world, which drove him to claim probation in another state; a plan, as he informed me, now generally adopted by Universalists, but for which they claim no direct Bible proof, and so it is only another phase of the Catholic purgatory system, and too bold and serious an assumption.

As to the last class of texts, I showed that all, every and whole, were uncertain, and must be limited, in some cases, the same as forever and everlasting—a fact which our Universalist friends seem not to have yet discovered, while they are wiser than torment teachers as to the latter terms.

Other isolated texts I answered, by reference to their contexts, and showing that the overwhelming number of plain texts for destruction forbid the explanation of restorationists. The only passage my opponent seemed to quote unfairly, was Ps. 2: 8—"I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance," &c., leaving out verse 9—"Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel," which I read as proof of our views.

Answering the mass of their texts by classes, gave me time to introduce our common direct proof for destruction. He was more wise and honest than the churches are, as he admitted the terms, destroy, perdition, consume, die, &c., meant literal death. But his attempt to show that they only meant violent, or untimely death on the earth, failed, as I could show that many of these terms must refer to a final doom at the judgment. But it is a sad fact, that Universalists either totally deny, or keep out of view, a final judgment day. I never have been able to learn from their writings nor debates, but that they believe this earth will eternally remain as it is—with at least the physical curse on it, and men be born as they are now. Some of their writings may give distinct views on this point, and if so, I should like to know what they are.

The numerous passages which tell that "no drunkard, liar, &c., shall inherit the kingdom of God, and of heaven," they say apply only to a standing in the church on earth. But this cannot be made to appear even plausible, and so they are fatal to restoration.

My friend tried the use of sympathy against destructionists, as they do to good effect against those who hold that saints can be perfectly happy while hearing their dear relatives wailing and cursing in their theological hell. This argument I met by showing the distinction between relative and social feelings; and that relative feelings could not exist in heaven, while social ones must, and so we would not miss relatives, if dead, any more than strangers. Christ called his diciples "mother and brethren," and "they marry not," &c., are Bible proofs of my position. And reason also sustains it; for if not so, then Paul, who had no children, would be disconsolate in heaven—saints, with a dozen children, would form happy groups there; while others, who were more faithful on earth, but had no relatives, must be, in part, hermits forever. I remarked to bachelors, that they were deeply concerned in this point of doctrine, and should look into it. We shall doubtless know relatives in the "new heavens and earth," but the whole sacramental host will be as dear to us as they, so we shall be gainers by the lack of relative feelings, as social ones will be infinitely enlarged.

At the close of our debate, I told my opponent he had been courteous and fair, with the exception of leaving me to do more than my share of battling the God-dishonoring doctrine of endless torment; but of this I would not complain, as I loved that kind of work.

As I left at once, I know not the result; but hope to be there soon, to finish the argument for our views, as the weather broke us off too soon. A new and wide door seems to be open for labor there. Number of inhabitants about 15,000.

One object I have in giving this outline, is to encourage brethren to adopt this course, where they can, to get our views before the people; for they will turn out to hear such discussions—want to hear how two classes of heretics can fight. And, besides, the masses are secretly restorationists, and we should labor to reach them, by destroying their hiding place—"use all means to save some."

The Christian's Warfare.

Faint not, weary pilgrim, though lonely, opprest,
On life's thorny pathway you ne'er will find rest;
What though fiery trials thy journey attend?
In the kingdom of Jesus they'll all have an end.

Press onward, then, pilgrim, you've counted the cost,
Tho' fainting and weary, shrink not at the cross;
For Jesus will guide thee o'er life's stormy sea,
His strong arm will shield thee wherever you be.

Cheer up, christian warrior, the armor gird on,
Through Jesus, your leader, the conquest is won;
Through much tribulation the kingdom you'll gain;
If you suffer with Jesus, with him you shall reign.

How cheering the thought, when life's conflicts are o'er,
We'll meet with the blest to be parted no more,
With raiments all washed in the blood of the Lamb,
All spotless and radiant before him we'll stand.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 14.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I have thought best to offer for your consideration a few thoughts more, connected with the subject upon which we have been treating.

I am aware that very many enter upon the higher walks of christian life with the expectation that their joys will increase—crosses and trials become lessened, and the way becomes more easy and delightful, as they advance onward. It is, however, the common experience of devoted christians, that, after a period of enlarged communications of light, peace, and joy, these emotions give place to "fiery trials"—crosses are multiplied—and furnaces more intensely heated are awarded them.

The disciples, after being favored with a bright and overpowering manifestation of divine glory, were sent forth to encounter persecution, weariness and hunger, as they proclaimed the "gospel of the kingdom;" they must follow Jesus to Gethsemane, and behold his agonies, and weep around his cross on Calvary.

After the "baptism of fire," on the day of Pentecost, there followed the baptism of suffering; and stripes, imprisonment and death, were the legacy of the devoted saint. In view of what awaits the consecrated one, I have sometimes felt as though I would fain impress it upon every one who seeks to enter the way of holiness, that they must expect deep humiliations, crucifying crosses, fiery trials, enemies, slander, hatred, and malice, (and that too from the professed followers of Jesus Christ,) but with all, grace sufficient to sustain—strength made perfect in weakness—the form of the fourth in the midst of the furnace—the hundred-fold in this life—peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ—the earnest of glory—and in the world to come, an imperishable treasure—an unfading inheritance—a golden mansion—a white robe—palm of victory—crown of glory—and life everlasting!

Here is the battle-field of strife against the enemies of the Lord; here is the race-ground; the laurels, the rest, the reward is in the kingdom. Happy they who have grace to endure and overcome!

In confirmation of what I have expressed, I would cite you to the examples of Holy Writ. Can you place your finger on one of the many illustrations of devotion to God, and say "there is one who was not made perfect through sufferings?" Not even the Son of God is an exception. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous;" but, thank God! "the Lord delivereth him out of them all." "Purified—made white, and tried." "Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth." Receive then chastisement, as a proof of thy Father's love, for, "if ye be without chastisement, whereof all (of God's children) are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons!" Abraham walked before God with a perfect heart, and was denominated the friend of God, and the father of the faithful," but how severe were his trials! Job was declared to be "perfect and upright," but through what fiery furnaces was he called to pass!

Paul, the eminent servant of Jesus Christ, who attained to that degree of perfection which enabled him to say,—"I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me;" and was caught away in vision to Paradise, where he saw glories indescribable, and heard words unutterable; recounts some of his trials thus:—"Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes, save one; thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned; thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often; in perils of waters; in perils of robbers; in perils by mine own countrymen; in perils by the heathen; in perils in the city; in perils in the wilderness; in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness; in watchings often; in hunger and thirst; in fastings often; in cold and nakedness."

Such were Paul's trials; yet, when he places them in the "balances of the sanctuary," and in the opposite scale puts the glory, he says of the former, "These light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things that are seen (the fiery trials) but at those things that are not seen," (the glorious reward.) How quickly the lighter scale goes up, although filled with multiplied afflictions, stripes, stones, hunger, thirst, cold, nakedness, with "perils" of various kinds; because the "glory" is weighty, it is an "exceeding weight," it is "far more exceeding," and it is an "eternal weight of glory!" That is Paul's legacy; are you willing to enter into partnerships with him?

Are you willing, "through much tribulation," to "enter the kingdom?" Are you willing to buy the gold that has been tried in the fire? Yours as ever,

M. D. W.

Ruins of Time.

Around the destruction which marks the track of time, memory lingers with regret Records of human grandeur lie scattered in the pathway of decay, and dark desolation reigns, where the proudest and most sublime monuments of human genius once stood in all their glory. These mournful trophies speak, in the awful voice of prophecy, that the grandest honors of life are fleeting.

Ruins! there is something in the word, even without the sight, that awes the soul and kindles the intellect. The Roman empire once arose bright in its finished splendor, to court the sunbeams; but her temples and columns are now a heap of ruins. In her temples, the solemn chant rose high and loud on the day of their consecration, when the white-robed priest called fire from heaven to bless the sacrifice. There was a day when her senate chambers rung with the thunders of applause, and the fires of eloquence burned brightly in their midst. The palace of Cæsar and the forum, where the reverberations of Cicero's eloquence still linger, stand as a sad memorial that the glory of the past is fast passing away. That empire, whose eagles have waved in triumph over a hundred battle-fields, and the fame of whose statesmen and orators still dwells on the brightest pages of history, is now remembered as a vivid example of the decay of human power. The brilliant victories of her armies, and the profound knowledge of her sages, are fast fading before the march of progress. Decay is robbing her of her past renown.

Away in the distance the proud city of Palmyra once arose; her temples, and works of art, the most beautiful of Oriental creation; the glory of her achievements, and the beauty of her maidens, dazzling the world; the splendor of her monarchs, and the rapidity of her rise, bidding fair to eclipse the fame of the city of "seven hills." But when she had gained the very zenith of her glory, and, like a brilliant planet, sent her radiance far and wide, ambition was silently wasting away the foundations of her greatness, and, for one moment of vain glory, the beautiful Zenobia sacrificed the triumphs of a hundred years. The victorious cohorts of Rome laid waste her marble palaces and brilliant temples, and the bloody Aurelian rode in triumph amid the scene of her desolation. The ivy and wall-flower now wreath it with a grave-like beauty, and every wind blows for it a mournful dirge.

And Spain, renowned, romantic land! what a sad scene she presents! Away back in the past we see her armies marching to conquest and to victory. The glorious deeds of the Cid, and the chivalry and gallantry of Don Roderick, shedding around that proud land a blaze of glory,—a land rich in the beauty of her scenery, and once renowned for the valor of her warriors. But the last vestige of her ancient glory has left her soil, and her children can only exult in her past renown. Sad must be the reflections of her sons, as, standing on the summit of the Sierra Nevada, or wandering on the bank of the Guadelquiver, their memory wanders back to the time when the gallant cavalier drove out the Moorish invader, and the triumphant shouts of the victorious soldiery echoed through the halls of the Alhambra. But the iron hand of priestcraft and superstition has galled its fair proportions, and Spain is only a relic of past grandeur.

Roll back the billowy tide of time, unroll the mouldering record of ages, and where is ancient Egypt, her Thebes, her Memphis, her oracle of Ammon? The arm of the Goth and the Vandal has leveled them to the dust. The oracle has been silent for ages, and the priestess long since fled from her falling shrine. We look for the far-famed Troy, whose name has been celebrated in romance and in song; but in vain we seek for the palaces of Priam, once illumined by the smiles of the faithless, though beautiful Helen, for whom Sparta fought, and Troy fell. The palace halls are silent, and the towers lie in the dust. The creeping ivy, running over the gray ruin and proud pile, has a sentiment that appeals yet more to the sense, than the classic lore of the best historian, or the strains of the best poet. They are the oracles of ages, they speak like a trumpet from the tomb, with a voice more impressive than the tongue of Tully, more symphonious than the harp of Homer, more graphic than the pencil of Appelles.

Man and his works decay, but nature and nature's God is eternal. The seasons keep their appointed time, day returns with its golden splendor, and night with its eloquent mystery. The same stars that lit the ghastly battle-field of Troy, rough with the dead bodies of ancient heroes, the same stars which shone on the marble streets of imperial Rome, and on the sad eyes of Virgil, sleepless with the living glow of inspiration, the watch-fires of the angels, which, through centuries of devastation and change have still burned on unceasingly,—the same stars speak to us (as they did to Dante, Shakespeare and Milton,) of the divine glory, the beauty and love of God. Time is man's; eternity is God's! Kingdoms may be crushed by the terrible car of tyranny, countries may be drenched in blood, the world may be rocked with revolution, yet time, with its dim, dark, silent wing, is ever flying on to the brink of eternity.

Oh, boundless eternity! who can number the countless ages that circle around the throne of Jehovah? Immortality is the priceless boon granted to the redeemed of earth.—"The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up: nevertheless we according to his promise, look for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." The blighting taint of the serpent will pass away with the ruins of a guilty world. "And the New Jerusalem shall come down out of heaven, as a bride adorned for her husband. And when the vast design is finished, when the grand scheme is completed, the purified hills will shake to a shout that never before rung over their towering tops; the waters will tremble to music, such as never before stirred their bright depths, and "Glory to God in the highest" will be a seven-fold chorus of harping symphonies! Again and again it will be taken up, and echoed from rank to rank of those celestial beings, till it comes rolling back, with all the strength of archangel voices, full on the throne of God. David will stand there, sweeping a harp far more melodious and tuneful than the one he swept with such a master hand on earth; on the golden wires of a celestial harp, he will weave the sweet, the long and lofty strains of immortality! Elijah will pour his soul of fire into it; Isaiah will give it a loftier echo. The martyrs, who shall have passed through the flames to their reward, will furnish new accessions to its strength, for all the ransomed of the Lord will be there and covered with the glory of Him whose glory makes pale the brightness of the sun, and dim the light of the moon; who is the Temple of the universe, wherein is no need of the sun, nor of the moon, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the light thereof.

RECEIPT FOR MAKING EVERY DAY HAPPY.—When you rise in the morning, form the resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow creature. It is easily done; a left-off garment to the man who needs it, a kind word to the sorrowful, an encouraging expression to the erring; trifles in themselves light as air will do at least for twenty-four hours;—and if you are young, depend upon it, it will tell when you are old; and if you are old, rest assured it will send you gently and happily down the stream of human time to eternity. By the most simple arithmetical sum look at the result: you send one person, any one, happily through the day; that is three hundred and sixty-five in the course of a year; and supposing you live forty years only after you commence that course of medicine, you have made fourteen thousand six hundred human beings happy, at all events for a time. Now, worthy reader, is this not simple? It is too short for a sermon, too homely for ethics, and too easily accomplished for you to say, "I would if I could."

"Behold, I Come Quickly; and my Reward is with Me."

How the true believer's bosom to these words responds with joy,
As he toils and struggles onward, though the world and sin annoy;
For he's waiting and he's praying till the Promised One appears,
Who will bring him joy for sorrow, and will wipe away his tears.

Though the worldlings laugh and jeer us, yet our lot is better far,—
When upon our dark horizon shines our "bright and morning star;"
All our trials and reproaches, woes, shall then forgotten be,
And we'll live and reign with Jesus through a long eternity.

Though the infidel may scoff us, and the proud may tread us down,
We can look beyond the present, and through faith behold a crown
Long prepared for those who loved Him, maugre ill-report and shame,
And whom then before his Father he'll delight to own and name.

O! the rapture of that greeting when the glorified shall meet,
And their thrilling songs of victory—what melody so sweet,
Shall float o'er hill and valley, through the arch of highest heaven,
For they sing of that salvation which their Lord to them has given.

Unconscious Influences.

BRO. GRANT:—Should you deem it proper to give the following extracts of a sermon upon unconscious influences a place in your valuable paper, perhaps some may be led more fully to realize "that no man liveth to himself."

"There are, then, two sorts of influence belonging to man; that which is active or voluntary, and that which is unconscious; that which we exert purposely, and that which flows out from us, unawares to ourselves. The tremendous weight and efficacy of our insensible influence, compared with the other, and the sacred responsibility laid upon us, are felt in no such degree or proportion as they should be; and the consequent loss we suffer in character, as well as that which the church suffers in beauty and strength, is incalculable. The influences we exert unconsciously will almost never disagree with our real character. They go streaming from us in all directions, though in channels that we do not see, poisoning or healing around the roots of society, and among the hidden wells of character. If good ourselves, they are good; if bad, they are bad.

The Bible calls the good man's life a light, and it is the nature of light to flow out spontaneously in all directions, and fill the world with its beams. So the christian shines, not so much because he will, as because he is a luminous object. How many persons do you meet, the insensible influence of whose manners and character is so decided, as often to thwart their voluntary influence; so that, whatever they attempt to do, in the way of controlling others, they are sure to carry the exact opposite of what they intend,

Next, there are twofold powers of expression—two kinds of language; that of speech in the literal sense, and that expression of the eye, the look, the tone, which is sometimes called the natural language of the sentiments. Speech is a door to the soul that we may open or shut at will; the other is a door that stands open, revealing to others constantly and often very clearly the tempers, tastes, and motives of the heart. Then if we go over to others, we find every man endowed with two inlets of impression; the ear and the understanding, and the [illegible] powers and sensibilities. They have a certain wonderful capacity to receive impressions from others, and observe how far this insensible communication and sympathy is sovereign over the character of families. What is the family spirit, in many a house, but the spirit of gain, or pleasure, or appetite, in which everything that is genial and good in religion is visibly absent. Every good man has thus a power in his person, more mighty than his words and arguments, and which others feel when he little suspects it.

If, too, every disciple is to be an "epistle known and read of all men," what shall we expect but that all men will be somehow affected by the reading? How often do we observe, too, that one or a few good men kindle at length a holy fire in the community in which they live; they endeavor, of course, to exert a good voluntary influence; but still their chief power lies in their holiness, and the sense they produce in others of their close relation to God; it is not mere words which turn men; it is the heart mounting, uncalled, in the expression of the features. You inhabit a house well nigh transparent, and you cannot reasonably doubt that others are continually receiving impressions from your character. Is your example harmless? Is it on the side of God and duty? First make it sure that you are not every hour infusing moral death insensibly into your children, wives, husbands, friends and acquaintances.

Dismiss, the [illegible] the thought that you are living without responsibility; that is impossible. The true philosophy of doing good, is to be good—to have a character that will of itself communicate good. The christian is called a LIGHT, not [illegible]. He must be so akin to God, and so filled with his dispositions, that he shall [illegible] surround himself with an [illegible] atmosphere. It is folly to endeavor to make ourselves shine before we are luminous.

Our doctrine of unconscious influence shows how it is that the preaching of Christ is often so unfruitful. It is not because truth ceases to be truth, but because there are so many influences preaching against the preacher. When the people of God are glowing with spiritual devotion and love to men, the case is different; then they are ALL preaching, and making an atmosphere of warmth for the truth, and its power is in proportion; but ah! you know not how easy it is to make a winter about us, or how cold it feels. We do not accuse you; that we leave to God, and to those who may rise up in the last day to testify against you. If they shall come out of your own families; if they are the children that wear your names, the husband or wife of your affections; if they declare that you, by your example, kept them away from Christ's truth and mercy, we may have accusations to meet of our own, and [illegible] leave you to acquit yourselves as best you may."

While reading this sermon, I recalled what Bro. Munger wrote in a late article, —"As soon as they got into working order, God gave them work to do,"—not the kind, however, that James tells about, "where envyings and strife [illegible] doctrine of which proceeds from "the wisdom that is from above, first pure, then gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy;" "laying apart all superfluity of naughtiness, and receiving with meekness the engrafted word." O! how the church of God has suffered, and is suffering, because its professed members will not take Christ's yoke upon them and learn of him who was meek and lowly in heart; who, while yielding to the influences that surround them, [illegible] that they should be about their Father's business.

Instead of following our leader, and saying by our actions and words, as for me, I will serve the Lord, how often are we found "comparing ourselves among ourselves, measuring ourselves by ourselves;" Bro. or Sr. A. do so and so, although they seem to think more of the letter than the Spirit. Bro. B., to convince somebody of the truth, gets all in a passion, and cannot say a word about the power of the gospel to subdue and bring into subjection our sinful natures, while no one would think Bro. C. was a christian, if he did not labor in meetings; he thinking he had no influence only there. Thus Bro. or Sr. L. are led unconsciously to possess the same spirit, and the church become lukewarm, if not frozen.

Oh! my brother, my sister, let us in all our ways acknowledge him; be burning and shining lights; working while the day lasts, that the heirs of salvation may the sooner be numbered, for THEN the kingdom WILL come, and everlasting life be given to all the dear children.

SARAH A. ELMORE.

Lending to the Lord.

A poor man, some of whose family were sick, lived near Deacon Murray, referred to in the tract "Worth of a dollar," and occasionally called at his house for a [illegible] of milk. One morning he came while the family were at breakfast. Mrs. M. rose to wait upon him, but the deacon [illegible] to her, "Wait till after breakfast." She did so, and meanwhile the deacon made some inquiries of the man about his family and circumstances.

After family worship, the deacon invited him to go out to the barn with him. When they got into the yard, the deacon, [illegible] ing to one of the cows, exclaimed [illegible] take that cow, and drive her home." The man thanked him heartily for the cow and started for home; but the deacon was observed to stand in the attitude of deep thought until the man had gone some rods. He then looked up, and called out, "Here, bring that cow back." The man looked around, and the deacon added, "Let that cow come back, and you come back too." He did so; and when he came back into the yard again, the deacon said, "There, [illegible] take your pick out of the cows; [illegible] agoing to lend to the Lord the poorest I've got."

A State Conference.

Bro. Grant:—I send you herewith a condensed report of some meetings that we have had in this State, to organize a "State Conference," by publishing which in the Crisis you will confer a benefit on us, for which we shall be very thankful. I have condensed it so as not to take up more room than is necessary, for I see that the Crisis is now much burdened with such reports. I have sent but little more than the Resolutions presented and adopted at the meetings.

You will perceive that we have not seen fit to call on the civil arm to legalize any of our movements, and we have all of us, who have been connected with this matter, confidence enough in each other, and the "cause" which we are connected with, to make such a deed quite unnecessary.

There is one thing more I might say about the matter. We have not undertaken to legislate in matters of faith, yet we are all of us, that are connected with the [illegible] once, steadfastly believing in the great [illegible] of Life and Death. We wish the churches in Rhode Island to take action on the Resolutions, and be prepared to send delegates to our next meeting, (which will be on the last Wednesday, Thursday and Friday in March,) with instructions to act at the conference.

Your Bro. striving for the kingdom and glory of the Lord Jesus,

Joseph D. Brown.

Providence, Feb. 22.

REPORT.

River Point, Dec. 29, 1858.

Wednesday, 2 o'clock, P. M. Met at [illegible] Odd Fellows' Hall in answer to a call from Eld. E. Bellows. After prayer by several brethren, Bro. Bellows asked to have a Moderator and Clerk of the meeting chosen, so as to go about business in order. Bro. Bellows was chosen Moderator, and J. D. Brown Clerk. Bro. B. then stated that the object he had in view in calling the meeting, was to consider what could be done toward gaining a more perfect understanding and co-operation among the churches in Rhode Island, and make arrangements to better supply the demand for labor in the destitute parts of the State. The remainder of the afternoon was spent [in] discussion, (which I will not detail.) Adjourned, to meet next day at 10 o'clock.

[Thurs]day, A. M., 10 o'clock. Met according to adjournment, Bro. Bellows presiding. After prayer, adopted the following Preamble and Resolutions, as the basis [of] organization:

We, ministers and delegates from different churches in Rhode Island, being met in Conference at River Point, to consider the propriety of organizing a State Conference in this State, for the purpose of concentrating our labors, so that we may work more effectually to spread the truth among the [peopl]e, and more in harmony together for mutual benefit; and,

Whereas, We believe that these results can be better obtained by such an organization,

Therefore Resolved, That we agree to form ourselves into a State Conference, to be held among the different churches in the State, for the purpose of having free discussion and interchange of views upon such Bible questions as may be presented, and agreed upon, and to transact such business as may come before us.

The remainder of the session was spent [in] discussing various matters. Adjourned, [to] meet at 2 o'clock, P. M.

2 o'clock, P. M. Met according to adjournment, Bro. Bellows presiding. After prayer, took the names of those who adopted the Resolution for organizing, which were as follows:

Eld. Geo. Champlin, pastor and delegate from Plains Church, Warwick; Eld. Eleazer Bellows, pastor and delegate from River Point Church; Brn. Jno. T. Dixon and P. C. Rodman, delegates from Rocky Brook Church, Peacedale; Eld. Jos. D. Brown and Bro. Jno. T. Sweet, delegates from "Second Advent Church," New Market Hall, Providence; Eld. Jos. Northrop, delegate from Carolina Mills Church; Eld. Benj. Roberts, Evangelist; Eld. Peter [illegible], Evangelist.

[illegible] Ratified the officers of the preliminary meeting as the officers of the Conference till our organization is completed.

Passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we recommend that this Conference become, in its operations, a "Home Missionary Society" for this State, and we further recommend to the different churches connected with this Conference, to make such collections as they are able, to [ai]d the Conference in sustaining Evangelists in the destitute fields in the State. [The b]rethren having been obliged to [leave] the present Conference, it was not [deem]ed proper to do more business at this [tim]e, so a committee, (Brn. Bellows and [Br]own,) was chosen to call the next meeting within three months. Adjourned, subject to the call of the committee.

Joseph D. Brown, Clerk.

Lafayette, Feb. 3, 1859. [The] Conference met by call of the committee, [Bro. B]ellows presiding. Delegates present [fr]om Lafayette, Providence, Peacedale, [River] Point, and several Evangelists. After prayer, (1.) reading the report of the last meeting, read, and adopted. (2.) The following name was chosen to designate the Conference.—Rhode Island State Conference of Reformers, looking for the immediate Second Advent of Christ. (3.) The following resolution on the order of the Conference:

Resolved, That the order of this Conference shall be (1.) The business. (2.) The discussion of some Bible question. (3.) Evening, at least, and more time if we have it to spare, shall be devoted to prayer and conference meetings, and "preaching the word." The following preamble and resolution was adopted in regard to preachers:

Whereas, It sometimes happens that when preachers are left to send appointments, through not sending them early enough, two or three preachers find themselves at once place, at one time; and,

Whereas, Our churches are generally poor, and cannot at such times give them all that support which they need, and,

Whereas, On this account, such churches are discouraged, and the preachers themselves disheartened; therefore,

Resolved, That for the good of churches and ministers, we request that preachers should not send appointments to churches in Rhode Island, (unless they have a decided impression, undoubtedly from the Lord, making it their duty to send an appointment,) but wait for the churches to send for them. And, we request them, if they do send such an appointment, to send it early enough, if possible, so that the church to whom it is sent, may make arrangements accordingly, for "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, in all the churches of the saints." The following question was adopted for discussion: Question—Are there any promises to the Jews, as a nation, yet to be fulfilled in the future? This question was discussed during the remainder of the time devoted to this matter, and then put over to the next conference. Adjourned, to meet on March 30th, 1859.

There are many things that were spoken of in these meetings that are not written in this condensed report; but they are written in the clerk's regular report, which will be read at the next meeting.

Joseph D. Brown, Clerk.

A Mother's Influence.

Hon. Thomas H. Benton, in a speech in New York, turned to the ladies, and, referring to his mother, said:

My mother asked me never to use tobacco, and I have never touched it from that time to the present day. She asked me not to game, and I have never gamed; and I cannot tell this day who is winning and who is losing in games that can be played. She admonished me, too, against hard drink; and whatever usefulness I may attain in life, I attribute to having complied with her pious and earnest wishes. When seven years of age, she asked me not to drink, and I made then a resolution of total abstinence. I formed an abstinence society at a time when I was the sole constituent member of my own body; and that I have adhered to it through all past time, I owe to my mother.

An Apt Reply.

A native deacon, named Hagop, now has the charge of the Protestant Armenian church at Trebizond, in Asia Minor, as there is no missionary there. Mr. Wheeler of Kharpoot says of this man, that he has good abilities, an excellent judgment, a good knowledge of the Bible, and a pleasing address. To show his shrewd quickness in reply, he relates the following anecdote:

"Some years since, the deacon was employed by an English mercantile house in Samsun, and was required to work on the Sabbath. This he steadily refused to do. His employer used all his ingenuity to convince him that it was necessary and right to do so then.

'What!' said he, one day, 'if an ass fall into a pit on the Sabbath, does not even the Savior say that it is right to pull him out?'

'Certainly,' said Hagop, 'but if an ass has a habit of going every Sabbath and falling into the same pit, then his owner ought either to fill up the pit, or sell the ass!'"

A Child's Logic.

Rev. T. W. Higginson, in a recent lecture in New York, told a story of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe and one of her little girls. The little girl, he said, came to her mother one day, and asked her if it was ever right to get angry? "O no, of course not," was the answer. "But," said the little girl, "it says in the Bible that God is angry with the wicked." "O, that is another thing; he is obliged to be angry." "What, God obliged! I thought he couldn't be obliged to do any thing." "Yes, he is, according to his holy law; you will understand it when you get older; you must wait till then." The little child wanted an answer; then she was quiet and thoughtful for a minute, and then, with a bright look, she said, "O, mother, I understand it now; it's because God isn't a christian."

John Randolph's Mother.—The late John Randolph, some years before his death, wrote to a friend as follows:—

"I used to be called a Frenchman, because I took the French side in politics; and though this was unjust, yet the truth is, I should have been a French atheist, if it had not been for one recollection, and that was when my departed mother used to take my little hands in hers, and cause me to say—'Our Father which art in heaven.'"

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1859.

Discussion at Newburyport.

Our discussion at Newburyport with Dr. Danforth passed off pleasantly, and, we hope, to the profit of some. Our question read as follows:—"Does the Bible teach that human spirits exist in a conscious state out of the body, and communicate with their friends in this world?" The main point of our opponent consisted in the position that angels are departed human spirits; but when we came to examine the Bible carefully, we could find no proof of such an assertion. On the contrary, the Scriptures declare that man was made "a little lower than the angels." If he was lower at his creation, when in an innocent state, we think he did not rise any higher when he sinned, and was driven from the tree of life "lest he . . . eat and live forever." Neither can we understand how he was made "a little lower" than himself; but we can easily conceive how he could be made lower than a higher order of beings, resembling him in their physical form. It is an absurdity to suppose that an object is made lower than itself when it is first made, and in its highest state.

Again, if angels are departed human spirits, man was made lower than the angels when there were none in existence; and, besides, the angels that have appeared to our race, have been as real, tangible beings, as the men to whom they have appeared. When they visited Lot, "he made them a feast, and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat." It would be a strange sight to see a disembodied human spirit, without any material organs, eating "unleavened bread." It is very clearly shown in the Bible that angels bear a striking resemblance, not to disembodied spirits, but to real, tangible men. Hence, we are instructed,—"Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." It is a well known fact, that man takes none of his physical organs with him to a "spirit land," at death; how is it, then, that such an ethereal affair as man is said to be, after death, comes in possession of an organism as tangible and material as the one possessed in this life; so that he can walk, have feet washed, be entertained, sit at table and eat bread and other food? Our Spiritualist friends have not yet, as I have heard, given us any solution of this difficulty. But when we read the plain Scripture account of men and angels, all is clear and harmonious.

Our opponent claimed that Spiritualism was a "new gospel." We did not hesitate to admit that it was most directly opposed to the gospel of Christ, but found the same doctrine was preached by Satan to Adam and Eve, and adopted by pagan and papal Rome. The doctrine of the resurrection was turned into ridicule. He stated that all the preaching was vain, if man is not conscious after the death of the body; but Paul says, "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain," thus resting all on the resurrection of the dead, which our opponent most positively denied. When pressed on this point, he said, Christ arose out of a dead body; or in other words, his spirit went off and left the body, which was never raised. He asserted that God is everywhere, and hence spirits of men go everywhere. He also denied that Christ was anything more than a mere man.

We did not hesitate to label his "new gospel,"—anti-Christ, because anti-Christ denies Father and Son. He assumed that his testimony was as good as Paul's or Daniel's, and asserted that he had seen three angels.

He said he had conversed with a spirit that had been unconscious for eighteen years, out of twenty-eight, that it had been in the spirit-land.

He thought the reason why Solomon said "the dead know not anything," was because he tried to get communications from departed human spirits, and, like some at the present day, could not succeed. He seemed to wonder why he himself should be so much more highly favored than Solomon.

He says this present gospel, Spiritualism, is the "perfect" that should come, and he feels that he is engaged in a noble work. This man was formerly a Methodist preacher. How truthful the teaching of the Holy Spirit, when it prompted Paul to write "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."

At the close of the discussion, a confirmed Spiritualist came forward and said, so far as the Bible is concerned, the Dr. has entirely failed in sustaining himself; but remarked, that he did not believe the Bible, and thought less of it now than ever; for he had supposed that it contained more proof in favor of Spiritualism, and was surprised to learn that there was so much in favor of the sleep of the dead.

Be Short.

Yes, be short, brother. No one will find fault with you for being too short. If any should be sorry because you did not preach longer, be assured they will come and hear you again, if possible; but when they begin to wish you would get through, and are really anxious to hear the closing word, it will be more difficult to get them out next time. We hear them say, "he is so tedious, I don't care much about going." It is a fact well known to some, that not a few of the most gifted preachers lose much of the influence they might have over the people, on account of their "long sermons." They tire out themselves and the people too, and wonder why their hearers are so uneasy when they are presenting truth so interesting and important. Because we have good food, it is not wise to stuff ourselves to surfeiting, so that an emetic is necessary to prevent a bilious fever. But it is replied, "they have not had any preaching in some time, and it may be a long season before they have another opportunity." Be it so. If one had been long fasting, should he eat a very hearty meal, so as to make up his deficiency of food? Such a course would be very injurious to health. But it is remarked, that notwithstanding you preached an hour, hour and a half, or two hours, some said, "I could have listened another hour." True, there are a few strong ones, who might endure it, but we are satisfied that seven eighths of the people will be profited more with a discourse not over forty-five minutes in length, than by one any longer. Some who have had great experience and observation, like John Wesley and other such revival men, give it as their opinion, that a sermon of thirty minutes is sufficiently long for the benefit of the hearers.

But few minds can listen more than forty-five minutes, without feeling wearied. It should be remembered that time seems only about half as long to the speaker as to the hearer. If the sermon be good and interesting, we get as much as we can well digest in forty-five minutes; and if it is a dull, dry discourse, we could not wish it to be longer. Come to the point at once, force it home with earnestness. Have something to say, say it, and stop when you get through. Nothing is much more tedious, than a long, dry sermon, in a warm sunny day, delivered in a dull, prosy manner. It is almost impossible to keep awake while listening. No wonder many conclude to go but half a day. Condense, condense, then arouse all your energies, and, filled with the Holy Spirit, hurl the truth like a thunderbolt into the midst of the Lord's enemies.

Will Children Obtain Immortality?

A correspondent wishes to know how young children obtain immortality, and if it is not an inherent quality of the human race?

Ans. It is certain they do not obtain it "by patient continuance in well doing," for they have done neither good nor evil, not having capacity to know one from the other. Immortality is a gift to all who do receive it, and is bestowed upon all the innocent. The infant is blameless, and hence receives this gift. It is a loser in being cut off from this life, but its loss is made up in the coming kingdom. Said Jesus, "Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. 19: 14. Wakefield renders this, "For of those who resemble them is the kingdom of heaven." Do those who are saved "resemble" those who are lost? Would Christ say, "of such is the kingdom of heaven," if none such were to be there?

Again says Jesus, "Except ye be converted, and become, as (like) little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. 18: 3. Are we to be converted and become like those who never enter the kingdom, in order to be accepted there? We understand that all belong to Christ, till they take themselves out of his hands by actual transgression, and then we must get back by reforming, and becoming like "little children" again.

A Suggestion.—If those who have the paper free, wish to assist us some, they might do us a favor, and their neighbor too, by persuading him to take the Crisis. To ensure success for our enlarged and improved edition, it will be necessary that all our friends should exert themselves to extend its circulation. We hope we shall not be obliged to reduce our free list, but on the contrary add many more. Come, brethren, lend us a helping hand. If the paper should afford any profits, they are to be appropriated for the benefit of the poor, and not for its conductors.

The New Tract.—"The Speechless Guest at the Marriage Feast," is now ready. This excellent and deeply interesting little work is from the facile pen of Bro. Cotton. Our readers are conversant with the author's style; and we need only say that this tract is worthy of him to secure an extensive reading. Send in your orders. It is but 5 cts., postage 1 ct.; $3.00 per hundred.

"The Voice."

New testimonies to the value and importance of this work are still pouring in. Rev. Geo. Duffield, D. D. of Detroit, Mich., author of two fine works on prophecy, writes—"I am glad that such a work as 'The Voice of the Church on the reign of Christ on the earth' has been prepared and published. It is calculated, I think, to do much good. The study of prophecy is beginning again to receive more attention."

Edward B. Foote, M. D., a very popular electrical therapeutist, and author of "Medical Common Sense," of which 5000 copies were sold in five months, writes from Saratoga Springs, N. Y., as follows:—

"I have had only time to give your book a cursory perusal, but, so far as I have looked into its pages, I find that its matter evinces peculiar ability and research. I like to see all theological questions boldly discussed, for only in this way can we arrive at great truths. I have no doubt your book will be productive of good—great good, I trust so, and wish you God speed."

Matt. 18: 10.

Bro. Grant:—Will you please explain Matt. 18: 10, as it is thought to prove the dead go to heaven as soon as they die?

D. N. Kidder.

The verse reads,—"Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father in heaven." We do not see how this passage can be pressed to favor the conscious state of the dead. The angels of those "little ones" are not the ones to whom they are angels. We learn that angels are an order of beings higher than men, for we read, man was made "a little lower than the angels," who are "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." This, with many other passages, settles the point that the angels of the "little ones," who behold the face of our "Father in heaven," are not the little ones over whom they are commissioned to exert a faithful watch-care.

Discussion.—We are to have a discussion with J. F. Walker, president of the Rutland Reform Convention, formerly a preacher in the M. E. Church and Principal of the Troy Conference Academy. The discussion is to be at Sandy Hill, N. Y., commencing Tuesday evening, April 5th, and continuing three evenings.

Subject, Resolved—"That man is wholly mortal and obtains immortality only through Christ, by continued well doing in this life."

Remember us in your prayers.

Questions.—Those who have sent questions, will need to have patience with us. For want of time, we have not been able to give the attention to this department that we desire, but we are hoping to come to it after a season.

Sayings of the Fathers.

The following are extracted from the sayings of Hermas, Barnabas and Ignatius. Says Herman, when speaking of future punishment,—

"These are indeed ordained unto death; but they who have known the Lord, and have seen his wonderful works, if they shall live wickedly, they shall be doubly punished, and shall die forever."—Similitude 9: 172. "The wicked, like the trees which thou sawest dry, shall as such be found dry and withered fruit in that other world; and like dry wood shall be burnt. . . . And they shall be burnt, because they have sinned and have not repented of their sins. And also all the other nations shall be burnt, because they have not acknowledged God their Creator."—Similitude 4: 4–5. "Whosoever therefore shall depart from evil desires, shall live unto God; but they that are subject unto them shall die forever." Command 12: 6.

Barnabas says:—"The day is at hand in which all things shall be destroyed, together with the wicked one." General epistle of Barnabas, chap. 15: 10. "The way of darkness is crooked and full of cursing. For it is the way of eternal death, with punishment; in which they that walk meet those things that destroy their own souls." Gen. Ep., chap. 15: 1.

Ignatius says:—"Stop your ears, therefore, as often as any one shall speak contrary to Jesus Christ; who was of the race of David, of the Virgin Mary. Who was truly born, and did eat and drink; was truly persecuted under Pontius Pilate; was truly crucified and dead; both those in heaven and on earth, and under the earth, being spectators of it. Who was also truly raised from the dead by his Father, after the same manner as he will also raise us up who believe in him, by Jesus Christ; without whom we have no true life. But if some who are atheists, that is to say, infidels, pretend that he only seemed to suffer (they themselves only seeming to exist); why then am I bound?" Epistle to the Trallians, chap. 2: 10–13. "I know that even after his resurrection he was in the flesh; and I believe that he is still so." Ep. of Ignatius to the Smyrnaeans. Chap. 1: 9.

A Wrong Conscience.—We never do evil so thoroughly and cordially as when we are led to it by a false principle of conscience.

For the Crisis.

Spiritualism.

Much has been said and written for a few years past upon Spiritualism. While some contend that it is of divine origin, and therefore the communications purporting to come from the spirit world, or the spirits of the dead, are reliable, and that the light and instruction received from that source is far in advance of that written on the Biblical page, and of course justifiable and safe to follow; others are as sanguine that it is the reverse, and originated from him whom Jesus declared to be a liar, and the father of it. And a third class are as confident it is all a deception, or at most but the result of legerdemain. All cannot be right, as they are at variance. And as there are probably many in each class of equal abilities and education; and as one man's "say so" will go just as far to prove his assertion as another's, with the same qualifications, it is evident that unless we have some rule or detecter by which to decide, higher than the authority of man, the truth must forever remain veiled in obscurity. But as the Bible claims to be a revelation of God to man, to direct him in the path of duty—a light to those who are in darkness—heavenly wisdom to those who obey its precepts, as well as a detecter of counterfeits; and having proved itself worthy of unshaken confidence to all who have tested its virtue by meeting those claims, let us search for light on the subject now under consideration by comparing it with what is written on those sacred pages.

We find the following command given by an inspired Apostle; "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God. (Why?) Because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world."—1 John 4: 1–3. By what shall we try them? We will let the prophet Isaiah answer.—"And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep, and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead? To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."—Isa. 8: 19: 20. Then we are to try the spirits by the law and testimony, which, another prophet informs us, is "The law of the Lord, which is perfect, converting the soul: and the testimony of the Lord which is sure, making wise the simple."—Ps. 19: 7. And we are further informed by inspiration that "The prophecy came not in old time (Marg. at any time,) by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 Pet. 1: 21. Also, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—2 Tim. 3: 16, 17. Jesus Christ taught his disciples that the Holy Ghost was the spirit of truth. And, said he, "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you. . . He will guide you into all truth . . And He will show you things to come."—John 14: 17–26; 16: 13. So much for authority. Now for the proof or trial.—"Because many false prophets are gone out into the world. . . . And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God." Do not those who seek unto the dead for light and instruction, instead of seeking unto Jesus Christ, deny by their works that He has come in the flesh? Why seek unto the dead, since He hath said, "I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life?"—John 8: 12. Again, "I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me. . . And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son."—John 14: 6, 13. Again, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. . . I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved."—John 10: 1, 9. "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."—Acts 4: 12. A denial that he has come in the flesh, is a denial of his resurrection; and Paul informed his Corinthian brethren that if Christ be not raised, their faith was vain; and they were yet in their sins. And they also which had fallen asleep in Christ had perished. But he further adds, "But now is Christ risen from the dead." Again, Jesus hath said, "He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." Look at the case of Saul who was made king over Israel. After he had rejected the word of the Lord, and the spirit of God had departed from him, and an evil spirit had taken possession of his heart, and being greatly afraid and sore distressed lest he should be overcome by the Philistines, who were warring against Israel, we find him going in disguise by night with his servants, to inquire of one who had a familiar spirit at Endor.—"And he said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit and bring me him up, whom I shall name unto thee. . . . Then said the woman, whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said Bring me up Samuel."—1 Sam. 28: 8, 11. And though the prophet Samuel, who had been some time dead, was personated, and he learnd his sad fate through that medium, did his conduct meet with the approbation of God? The answer is found in 1 Chron. 10, 13, 14.—"So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, even against the word of the Lord which he kept not, and also for asking council of one that had a familiar spirit, to inquire of it; and inquired not of the Lord: therefore he slew him, and turned the kingdom unto David the son of Jesse." And it is noted in the catalogue of sins of one of his successors who was exceedingly wicked, that he "dealt with familiar spirits."—2 Kings 21: 6. Again, hear the word of the Lord by Moses to the children of Israel just before his death, and their entrance into the land of Canaan. Deut., part of the 18th chapter.—"When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations. There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer. (Necromancy is defined by the learned to be, "The pretended art of revealing future events by communication with the dead, enchantment, conjuration. Undoubtedly the dead are personated by "familiar spirits," or "seducing spirits," but I have yet to learn that there is any communication between the living and the dead—perhaps a further investigation may throw more light upon the subject. But to return.) For all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord: and because of these abominations the Lord thy God doth drive them out from before thee. . . . The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto Him ye shall hearken; . . . And it shall come to pass (saith the Lord) that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him." Peter, when quoting the last named verses, applied them to Jesus Christ.—Acts 3: 19–23.

Again it is written, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly (the spirit of truth) that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry." 1 Tim. 4: 1–3. When? "In the latter times"—last end of the gospel dispensation, of course, as Paul wrote in the commencement. And though forbidding to marry may have had its fulfillment in part in other corrupt institutions of the "latter times," do we not find it more clearly developed, and in a more daring manner than heretofore, in the so-called "Free Love Union?" I think that is the name given it by the Spiritualists, which, if carried into effect, as they design, would abrogate the marriage covenant which was ordained by God, and undermine all society, both civil and religious.

Said the dear Savior,—"Ye shall know them by their fruits"—and such are some of the fruits of "giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." And parallel with the above quotation, we find another in the Revelation of Jesus Christ to his servant John on the Isle of Patmos. He saw in vision, in the prospective, under the pouring out of the sixth vial, (which is the symbol of the sixth plague, and last but one,) "Three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet;" which were explained to be "the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty."—Rev. 16: 13–14. In the following verse we hear Jesus saying, "Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments." If so, what age of the world are we living in? St. Paul further informs us of characters which would be prominent in the "last days," who would resist the truth, as "Jannes and Jambres" "withstood Moses."—2 Tim. 3d chap. How was that? Was it not by counterfeiting it? When Moses wrought a miracle by the power of God, "the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments,"—which was a number of times repeated; but ere long they were brought to acknowledge "the finger of God" in the miracles wrought by Moses, as their "enchantments" failed to work.—Ex. 7th and 8th chaps. And all will have thus to acknowledge who follow their example.

So we find that this is no new doctrine that has lately arisen; it has only come out in a new garb, in fulfillment of "Holy Writ," which informs us that it would b[e] very prominent characteristic of the "last days." It has "appeared" in many different forms, in different ages of the world, and been called by various names, which might all be classed under the head of "Sorcery," whose adherents we find at last, by tracing the subject through the Bible, among those who "shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death."—Rev. 21: 8. Does not the fulfillment of these Scriptures show us where we are in the calendar of time? O then flee to the Savior! "Escape for thy life!" Lest the avenger of blood overtake thee, and thou perish in thy sins. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, (the spirit of truth) shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."—Gal. 6: 7,8. "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" Rom. 6: 16.

...so well, not deal in fiction

May we yield ourselves servants to obey God, that when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God:" and shall shake the heavens and earth from centre to circumference, and wake the sleeping dead, we may be numbered among the "victors" who shall "stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God," and join in the angelic song of Moses and the Lamb. The Symbols.--No. 2.

In the first article on the symbols of the holy Scripture, Feb. 28, my aim was to state the oft-asserted truth of Revelation, that the "four" symbols of the "four kingdoms" need no explanation. When a fanciful, uninformed mind undertakes to explain this revealed truth of God, he is like the child I once saw, who held up his little light, as it swealed and flickered, and well nigh expired in the evening breeze, to see the stars.

I. "The four seasons, four angels, four corners of the earth, four horns of the altar, four sides of Israel's encampment, four standards, four symbols on these standards, four living creatures, four faces and four wings," are all definite, unconfused and absolute—like the "four horns" of Zech. 1: 18–22, who are the "four" (Gentile kingdoms) that have scattered Israel, Judah and Jerusalem. Nothing in language can be more simple—no truth can be more intelligible, authoritative or divine. The mind that is confused here, so as to contract it to three, or expand the number to five, must be a "babe," or something less. This God-given truth has been in the world over twenty-two centuries. The apparent effort of God, in the operations of his grace, has been of late to bring out this one grand outline truth; for under, and within this range, all other points, touching the first and second advent, the resurrection of the dead, and the opening scenes of the kingdom of God, have their appropriate place.

II. These four empires, so symbolized, are successive, one following the other.

III. The first distinctive representation of "the times of the Gentiles" was general, and undistinguished, as to name, number or succession.—Isa. 10: 24–27. The later prophets gave the detail of name, number and order of succession, as well as geographical location. A disregard of this leaves our testimony confused, weak and comparatively worthless.

IV. The fourth, and last in every series of Scripture symbols, is the Roman Empire. This is "the desolator" of Zion.—Dan. 9: 27. "That which is determined shall be poured on the desolator,"—or Rome. Rome alone is emphatically guilty of the blood and bondage of Israel during near 2,000 years. Rome has on her escutcheon the scarlet symbol of her martyred millions of the saints. Hence, we ask all to let this stand in its place, before the public mind, like unyielding rock. If this is once seen and acknowledged, then we shall be prepared, I trust, to see and own

V. That Rome, in the book of Revelation, is not symbolized confusedly, but clearly, successively and, to the believer, unmistakably. The Assyrian of Isaiah is but the generic name of Gentile domination over Judah, that was drawn out into detail in Dan. 2; 7; 8; 9; 11; and Zech. 1: 18. So the fourth symbol in Daniel, Zechariah, etc., is the general symbol of Rome, that has been disclosed more distinctively in the foreseen stages of its history, on to its doom. The dragon, the forty-two months beast, and the two-horned beast, are but variations of the Romish symbol in the ancient prophets.

This is determined by the precise limitations of number, name and destiny, given to each and all the great powers, revealed in foregoing prophecy, by the fact that these symbols were fulfilled one at a time. Indeed, the nature, the sphere and power of the agency symbolized, forbade a rival. The great red dragon, (Rev. 12,) admitted of no rival human power. No other was contemporaneous with it.

The next stage of the earth, under Rome, is seen, through "forty-two months," in the beast "with seven heads and ten horns," to whose dominion "all kindreds, and tongues, and nations" are subjected. This allows of no rival human power—no contemporaneous and opposing symbol. It has the field. It alone prevails, as a raging beast, over all; and all, save the saints, own his sway.

The last stage—the period following the forty-two months, is symbolized by the two-horned beast, which reaches the end of the series. But the closing scenes are given scores of times, all which need to be seen and acknowledged, in order to attain the full prophetic view. But the last and crowning symbol of this persecuting, blood-stained power, presents it as it goes to the judgment.—Rev. 17: 1, 18. This symbol is not simple, but compound, comprehending the Roman hierarchy and Roman civil power—the Romish Church and State. "The judgment of the woman and the beast" is the object of this vision. All the imagery and corresponding history centre in Rome—that seven-hilled capital of the Gentile world, from the days of the apostles down to our own times.

"The seven heads are seven mountains, where the woman sittith; and they are seven kings." The head or king, (each one in its day,) guides and governs the body, all within its sphere. "Five have fallen. One is, and the other, (to fill out the seven,) hath not yet come!" This proves them successive—one at a time.

It is not now my purpose to specify these symbols, and compare at length the history of the fulfillment; suffice it to say, that Pagan Rome at first filled the prophetic earth as the power; then Rome Papal had its predicted period; and all, aside from "the saints," bowed and owned its desolating sway. The sixth head, and all the horns, strove mainly to bask beneath the great harlot's whorish smile, or polluting embrace. The third head of that period—the sixth in the series—was maintained with various mutations, "like the troubled sea," till it was abolished by Francis II., 1806. Papacy was subverted; and Napoleon founded a new dynasty, as emperor of France and king of Italy. This must be but for "a short space."

Its history is written,—"Was, is not, and yet is." Napoleon I. was, (the chief in all Rome;) Napoleon II. is not, (head at all, in vision;) Napoleon III. "IS!" "The empire is peace," says he. All say "peace," without Christ; but "there is no peace to the wicked." Yet they are "deceiving and deceived," as to peace, till they are caught in the snare.—1 Thess. 5: 1–3.

Here is the word of God. Here is a series of facts that seem, at least, of corresponding importance. But the crowning point is, that no rival, no second, no variable and mystical system can come in to crowd out these symbols of Rome papal and imperial. Had God said but once that the number is "four," and traced the fourth on through its foreseen stages to its doom at the judgment, that should settle the question; but being oft asserted, it is to assure our minds that the "vision is certain, and the interpretation (of God) sure."

Truth is straight, plain and unconfused. Error is as variable as the spotless beast of vision, (Rev. 13;) nay, it is crooked, like the old serpent's trail; it is not in the nature of the serpent to go or lie straight.

The light and spirit of God, through the last twenty-five years, with all our ministrations, has only convinced a few that "the fourth kingdom" of prophecy is Rome, the close of the series, and that it is to be destroyed at the judgment. The world, flesh and devil, with all their waves, drive and wash against this rock; but God, in his providence, is directing all to the downfall of Rome, the deliverance of Israel and his saints, and the establishment of his kingdom.

Rome and her daughters have no human successors. "The mystery of iniquity" is thereby embraced. One series is enough! This series of four is exhausted, and hence there is no room for another. Lord, let "thy kingdom come." Amen.

The Staple Error.

For many generations the doctrine of inherent immortality has been preached to the world. The Pagans knew nothing of the doctrine of the Resurrection, hence they readily cherished the fond idea of the soul's immortality in their system of philosophy. The doctrine took deep root in the Grecian mind. It received strength and notoriety from the teachings of such men as Socrates, Plato, and Pythagoras. These were men whose great minds grasped many noble truths, but without the light of revelation to guide them into the true knowledge of man's destiny, they grasped their way into darkness, and thus developed a system which has proved a stumbling block to all succeeding generations. When Papacy blended Paganism with its corrupt system of religion, the immortality of the soul received a prominent place in its creed. And at last, even the Protestant churches have come to sanction the idea—nay, closely adhere to it. Now, all over the land, thousands and tens of thousands believe in Satan's lie,—man thou shalt never die.

For the Crisis.

"The Time is Short."

The time of probation on which hangs our eternel destiny, is short. It is passing swiftly away. Are we improving it for the great end for which it is given? Is our eternal life secured by obedience to the two great commands of the Almighty God, "Repent ye, and believe the gospel?"—Mark 1: 15. Does our repentance work godly sorrow for sin, or doth it need to be repented of, being unholy and selfish? Is our faith in the glorious gospel a holy, vital, operative principle; or does it leave us in communion with a carnal world, destitute of those fruits of the spirit of God, which are an earnest of the sacred joys of the everlasting inheritance?

The time for working in our Lord's vineyard, for his honor and glory, in the increasing sanctification of his redeemed, and the saving of our fellow men from everlasting death, is short, very short. Are we "exhorting one another (to holiness) daily, and so much the more as we see the day (of the Lord) approaching?" Are we faithful to dying men who may be eternally saved through our instrumentality? Are we, in accents of love, earnestly entreating them to come unto Him who gave his precious life to redeem them from everlasting death, in whose heart of love there yet is room for them?

The time of the conflict of the faithful soldier of Jesus Christ, who is valiant for the truth, and is willing to endure hardness for the Captain of his salvation, is short. Soon the victory will be gained and celebrated with joy unspeakable and full of glory! The toil and sorrows of the weary pilgrim to Mount Zion, shall soon terminate forever in the sweet rest of the Holy City, where the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb will be the everlasting light and the glory. Are we honoring our Father in heaven, by letting "patience have its perfect work" in our submissive minds? Do the trials of our faith—the "afflictions which are but for a moment," make us, by the grace of God, more reconciled to God, more watchful and prayerful, more dead to the present world, and thus work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory?

Finally, dear reader, are we daily increasing in those good works of practical love and self-denial, without which, all our religious knowledge and faith, and all our forms of godliness, are but as the sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal? Are we good stewards of the property the Lord has entrusted to us for the benefit of the poor and needy around us, especially such as are of the household of faith? Soon will he say unto us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it (or not done it) unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it (or not done it) unto me." The tremendous realities of eternity will soon burst upon us. Henry Grew.

God Unchangeable.—There are many Christians like young sailors, who think the shore and the whole land do move, when the ship and they themselves are moved; just so, not a few imagine that God moveth, and faileth, and changeth places, because their godly souls are subject to alteration; but the foundation of the Lord abideth sure—Rutherford.

We only make grief double
By dwelling on it long.
Why clasp Woe's hand so tightly?
Why sigh o'er blossom's dead?
Why cling to forms unsightly?
Why seek not joy instead?'

Correspondence.

From Ruth G. Bailey.

Bro. Grant.—I have the pleasure of sending you one new subscriber for the next vol., and wish I could add more, I feel like heartily recommending the Crisis to the perusal of all my friends, and wish I could see them ready to rejoice with me in the precious truths it heralds forth. But alas! there are a portion of those whom we esteem as friends, so completely bound by the traditions of men as to see neither truth or comeliness in, what appears to us, plain Bible doctrine; and who are ready to toss aside these weekly messengers of mercy without even a slight perusal. The cry of my soul is, Oh! that they would be wise, and hearken to the voice of instruction and warning. But if they will not, we can only commit their cases to Him who overruleth all things. My desire is, so to walk that I may be classed among that "peculiar people," who are still watching for the return of the Nobleman. This is not because I love my old friends and all who show a christian spirit less, but that I love this blessed truth, and those identified with it more. As a shipwrecked crew, who have seen many of their number swept from the deck, while they through many perils and hardships, still survive, must feel a peculiar interest in one another;—so the few faithful ones who have outrode the storm of error and contention, and are still standing firm for truth, are dearer to one another than if their perils and trials of faith had been less.

Dear brethren and sisters, the haven of eternal rest is a little in the future. We are not a wrecked crew. Our Pilot will guide the ship, and if we are faithful in our duties, we shall soon reach home in safety.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

New York, March 6.

Steamship Jura, from Liverpool 10 A. M., Feb. 18, has arrived at this port.

The war in Oude is over. The forts have been destroyed, and 400,000 stand of arms have been surrendered.

The Begum and Nana Sahib are supposed to have fled, with their followers, into Nepaul.

Tantia Topee has suffered three successive defeats, and in all directions the remnant rebels have been decimated.

The Sultan is angry with the people of the Danubian Principalities, and has a tolerably large body of soldiers on his own side of the river, but he knows better than to commence hostilities, and, therefore, appeals to a conference of the great powers. The conference is shortly to take place at Paris.

There is a dark spot in the East. There is, we are told, the possibility of a Turkish and Austrian army being marched into the Danubian Principalities, in order to prevent the Roumams from becoming a united people under Prince Couza, their universally elected Hospodar. France, Russia, and Piedmont will object to this, and England will probably support Austria and Turkey.

The Continental news again grows warlike. If the Emperor of the French is pacific, his cousin, Prince Napoleon, is decidedly warlike. The consequence is a marked division in the policy of the empire. The Presse had an article which alarmed the Council, and it was only after a warm discussion that a warning was given. The Prince protested against the proceedings. The Emperor, it is said, is desirous of emulating his uncle, and of tempting danger in the field of fight, and possibly Sardinia thinks he will, for in Piedmont the Court is for a passage of arms with Austria. There lies the danger, for Piedmont, by a sudden movement, can inaugurate a European war. Austria, however, is courteous towards France.

The Herald's Paris correspondent states that the whole army of Lyons has been placed on a war footing, and that its equipages de campagne have been ordered to be got in readiness without delay.

Orders have been given to the Chamber of Commerce to abstain from giving expression to their ardent wishes for peace.

The Ministerial warning given to the Presse has created a great sensation, and Rentes in consequence rose last night on the Boulevards 40 centimes. The article which led to the warning being given, contains the following passage: "Italy does not rely on her own unaided efforts to throw off the yoke of her oppressors. She invokes the co-operation of generous nations. Ought we not to welcome with gratitude the opportunity of putting a termination to the anxiety which torments Europe? Austria does not only raise her head everywhere in Italy, but also elsewhere. Would not a war which would deliver us from this nightmare be blessed above all other wars? Such, we believe, is the war preparing in Italy."

The correspondent of the Herald says the warning reached the Presse while it was on the printing machine, and as it contained another warlike article, still more violent, this had to be taken out, and the journal did not appear till 6 30 P. M.

It was reported in Paris that Baron Hubner threatened to demand his passports if he did not obtain satisfaction on account of the above articles, and that the proposal to give the Presse a warning, led to a violent discussion in the Cabinet Council, it being strenuously opposed by Prince Napoleon.

M. de Lesseps left Paris on the 15th for Alexandria, for the express purpose of commencing the Suez Canal.

SARDINIA.

The Paris correspondent of the Times asserts, on trustworthy ground, that the King of Sardinia is determined on making an attempt to drive the Austrians, with the object of constituting for himself a kingdom strong enough to resist Austria on the one hand, and France on the other, if need be, and that it will comprise Venice, and at least 12,000,000 subjects.

An absolute certainty is felt at the Court of Turin that France will help Piedmont against Austria, and that Russia will be with him passively, if Austria be left to fight alone, but actively and openly if any other power assists Austria. England and Prussia are expected to be neutral. The above is asserted to be the deliberate plan of the King of Sardinia and his Cabinet, and nothing but the withdrawal of France will divert them from it.

The news from the Danubian Principalities is considered of a serious character, and in that quarter which may be more difficult to deal with than the affairs of Italy.

A fresh despatch of troops to Constantinople was expected at that city.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The London Times of the 4th has a decided article on British relations with Mexico, in which it says, "we are inclined to think that the time has come when the honor and interests of England demand a stern interference." It adds: "It is now stated on the highest authority that the British naval commander on the station has received instructions to demand, and, 'if necessary, to enforce, due reparation,' and we trust that, while reiterating, if necessary, to the whole world that we have no intention of adding one inch of Mexican ground to Her Majesty's territory, the government will not hesitate to use all the means in its power to support the just rights of the people it represents."

The project of the Post is a recommendation of the treaty of 1815. Let the powers of Europe fail to take this course, and though no declaration of war may be made, a collision on the frontier will arise. Piedmont is sure to be involved in hostilities with Austria, France will be bound to succor Piedmont, and the torch of war once lighted, no one can tell when it will be quenched.

To England there seems but one duty, that of saying energetically, that without war or any other disturbance of the general peace of Europe "Italy shall be free."

Advices by telegraph state that fighting has commenced in Montenegro. The Russians had been repulsed in an attempt to take the town of Gheladjik, on the Circassian coast.

Personal.—Kossuth is said to be in straitened circumstances, living on the proceeds of his lectures and contributions to newspapers, eked out by the remnant of his wife's $20,000, most of which was lost in railroad investments in the United States. The $100,000 collected by him in this country has all been expended on political objects, not a cent being appropriated by Kossuth for his own use. The great Magyar is said to look twenty years older than he did when in this country, seven years ago.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Randolph, Crawford Co., Pa., Jan. 24th, Sarah Araminta, only daughter of Bro. Edw. Tyler, aged 15 years 6 months, of typhoid and lung fever.

Sister Araminta loved the blessed truth of the soon coming King, and the truths connected therewith. In July 15th, 1858, in company with quite a number of others, she went down into the liquid grave, showing her faith in Jesus and the resurrection. Little did we think then that Sr. Araminta would so soon be laid in the cold and silent dust. But she has gone, and we humbly trust will have a part in the morning of the resurrection, when Jesus who is our life shall appear. She leaves a number of friends to mourn her loss.

"Nature will mourn departing friends"

And in the language of her father, we say, our days, weeks, months and years, glide swiftly away, leaving little, save sorrow's trace behind. Yet "we sorrow not as those which have no hope;" for soon we believe that Araminta will come again from the land of the enemy, and shine forth in the kingdom of our heavenly Father.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

Bro. J. Wendell of Edenboro, Pa., preached an interesting discourse to a large congregation, from Ps. 6: 4, 5.—"Return, oh Lord, deliver my soul: oh save me for thy mercies' sake. For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" John T. Ongley.

Expositor, please copy.

Died, in Norway, Me., July 10th, 1858, Enoch Merrill, aged 77 years.

Bro. Merrill was a native of Andover, Mass. In early manhood he came to the woods of Maine to settle. Soon a revival commenced in Norway, where he settled, in which he shared; and was soon with others organized into a Baptist Church, of which he remained an exemplary member until he fell on sleep.

He leaves five sons and two daughters to mourn the loss of an affectionate father. Thus "man lieth down, and riseth not until the heavens be no more."

Died, of consumption, in Providence, Jan. 27th, 1859, Sr. Lucinda D. Tyler, aged 32 years.

Sr. Tyler was converted and baptized in the spring of 1856, and from that time she rejoiced in hope. A family required her attention, so that she was confined much at home; but when she could meet with the saints, she was glad of the opportunity to speak of the Savior, and the hope she had through him. She leaves a circle of friends, of whom some, having faith in the Lord, do not mourn, as "others who have no hope." She died believing that she must rest in unconsciousness until Jesus comes and wakes the sleeping saints, and rejoicing in hope of being among them. The writer attended the funeral on Sunday, Jan. 30th, and endeavored to show that her hope would not be in vain. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."—Ps. 116: 15.

Joseph D. Brown.

Died, in Brimfield, Mass., Jan. 10th, 1859, Wilson Ainsworth, aged fourteen years and five months.

He sleeps in Jesus; and such will God bring with him

"When shall the tedious night be gone?
When will our Lord appear?
Our fond desires would pray him down,
Our love embrace him here!"

J. E. Ainsworth.

Died, in Bloomfield, Crawford Co., Penn., Oct. 21st, 1858, of consumption, Charles Henry Porter, only child of Samuel F. and Jane A. Porter, aged nineteen months.

Yes, he sleeps in yonder grave-yard,
By his little sister's side;
Sweet they sleep, and none can wake them
Till th' Archangel's trump shall sound.

very prominent characteristic of the "last days." It has "appeared" in many different forms, in different ages of the world, and been called by various names, which might all be classed under the head of "Sorcery," whose adherents we find at last, by tracing the subject through the Bible, among those who "shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death."—Rev. 21: 8. Does not the fulfillment of these Scriptures show us where we are in the calendar of time? O then flee to the Savior! "Escape for thy life!" Lest the avenger of blood overtake thee, and thou perish in thy sins. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, (the spirit of truth) shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."—Gal. 6: 7,8. "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" Rom. 6: 16.

May we yield ourselves servants to obey God, that when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God:" and shall shake the heavens and earth from centre to circumference, and wake the sleeping dead, we may be numbered among the "victors" who shall "stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God," and join in the angelic song of Moses and the Lamb. The Symbols.—No. 2.

In the first article on the symbols of the holy Scripture, Feb 28, my aim was to state the oft-asserted truth of Revelation, that the "four" symbols of the "four kingdoms" need no explanation. When a fanciful, uninformed mind undertakes to explain this revealed truth of God, he is like the child I once saw, who held up his little light, as it swealed and flickered, and well nigh expired in the evening breeze, to see the stars.

I. "The four seasons, four angels, four corners of the earth, four horns of the altar, four sides of Israel's encampment, four standards, four symbols on these standards, four living creatures, four faces and four wings," are all definite, unconfused and absolute—like the "four horns" of Zech. 1: 18–22, who are the "four" (Gentile kingdoms) that have scattered Israel, Judah and Jerusalem. Nothing in language can be more simple—no truth can be more intelligible, authoritative or divine. The mind that is confused here, so as to contract it to three, or expand the number to five, must be a "babe," or something less. This God-given truth has been in the world over twenty-two centuries. The apparent effort of God, in the operations of his grace, has been of late to bring out this one grand outline truth; for under, and within this range, all other points, touching the first and second advent, the resurrection of the dead, and the opening scenes of the kingdom of God, have their appropriate place.

II. These four empires, so symbolized, are successive, one following the other.

III. The first distinctive representation of "the times of the Gentiles" was general, and undistinguished, as to name, number or succession.—Isa. 10: 24–27. The later prophets gave the detail of name, number and order of succession, as well as geographical location. A disregard of this leaves our testimony confused, weak and comparatively worthless.

IV. The fourth, and last in every series of Scripture symbols, is the Roman Empire. This is "the desolator" of Zion—Dan. 9: 27. "That which is determined shall be poured on the desolator,"—or Rome. Rome alone is emphatically guilty of the blood and bondage of Israel during near 2,000 years. Rome has on her escutcheon the scarlet symbol of her martyred millions of the saints. Hence, we ask all to let this stand in its place, before the public mind, like unyielding rock. If this is once seen and acknowledged, then we shall be prepared, I trust, to see and own

V. That Rome, in the book of Revelation, is not symbolized confusedly, but clearly, successively and, to the believer, unmistakably. The Assyrian of Isaiah is but the generic name of Gentile domination over Judah, that was drawn out into detail in Dan. 2; 7; 8; 9; 11; and Zech. 1: 18. So the fourth symbol in Daniel, Zechariah, etc., is the general symbol of Rome, that has been disclosed more distinctively in the foreseen stages of its history, on to its doom. The dragon, the forty-two months beast, and the two-horned beast, are but variations of the Romish symbol in the ancient prophets.

This is determined by the precise limitations of number, name and destiny, given to each and all the great powers, revealed in foregoing prophecy, by the fact that these symbols were fulfilled one at a time. Indeed, the nature, the sphere and power of the agency symbolized, forbade a rival. The great red dragon, (Rev. 12,) admitted of no rival human power. No other was contemporaneous with it. The next stage of the earth, under Rome, is seen, through "forty-two months," in the beast "with seven heads and ten horns," to whose dominion "all kindreds, and tongues, and nations" are subjected. This allows of no rival human power—no contemporaneous and opposing symbol. It has the field. It alone prevails, as a raging beast, over all; and all, save the saints, own his sway.

The last stage—the period following the forty-two months, is symbolized by the two-horned beast, which reaches the end of the series. But the closing scenes are given scores of times, all which need to be seen and acknowledged, in order to attain the full prophetic view. But the last and crowning symbol of this persecuting, blood-stained power, presents it as it goes to the judgment.—Rev. 17: 1, 18. This symbol is not simple, but compound, comprehending the Roman hierarchy and Roman civil power—the Romish Church and State. "The judgment of the woman and the beast" is the object of this vision. All the imagery and corresponding history centre in Rome—that seven-hilled capital of the Gentile world, from the days of the apostles down to our own times.

"The seven heads are seven mountains, where the woman sitteth; and they are seven kings." The head or king, (each one in its day,) guides and governs the body, all within its sphere. "Five have fallen. One is, and the other, (to fill out the seven,) hath not yet come!" This proves them successive—one at a time.

It is not now my purpose to specify these symbols, and compare at length the history of the fulfillment; suffice it to say, that Pagan Rome at first filled the prophetic earth as the power, then Rome Papal had its predicted period; and all, aside from "the saints," bowed and owned its desolating sway. The sixth head, and all the horns, strove mainly to bask beneath the great harlot's whorish smile, or polluting embrace. The third head of that period—the sixth in the series—was maintained with various mutations, "like the troubled sea," till it was abolished by Francis II., 1806. Papacy was subverted; and Napoleon founded a new dynasty, as emperor of France and king of Italy. This must be but for "a short space."

Its history is written,—"Was, is not, and yet is." Napoleon I. was, (the chief in all Rome;) Napoleon II. is not, (head at all, in vision;) Napoleon III. "IS!" "The empire is peace," says he. All say "peace," without Christ, but "there is no peace to the wicked." Yet they are "deceiving and deceived," as to peace, till they are caught in the snare.—1 Thess. 5: 1–3.

Here is the word of God. Here is a series of facts that seem, at least, of corresponding importance. But the crowning point is, that no rival, no second, no variable and mystical system can come in to crowd out these symbols of Rome papal and imperial. Had God said but once that the number is "four," and traced the fourth on through its foreseen stages to its doom at the judgment, that should settle the question; but being oft asserted, it is to assure our minds that the "vision is certain, and the interpretation (of God) sure."

Truth is straight, plain and unconfused. Error is as variable as the spotless beast of vision, (Rev. 13,) nay, it is crooked, like the old serpent's trail; it is not in the nature of the serpent to go or lie straight.

The light and spirit of God, through the last twenty-five years, with all our ministrations, has only convinced a few that "the fourth kingdom" of prophecy is Rome, the close of the series, and that it is to be destroyed at the judgment. The world, flesh and devil, with all their waves, drive and wash against this rock; but God, in his providence, is directing all to the downfall of Rome, the deliverance of Israel and his saints, and the establishment of his kingdom.

Rome and her daughters have no human successors. "The mystery of iniquity" is thereby embraced. One series is enough! This series of four is exhausted, and hence there is no room for another. Lord, let "thy kingdom come." Amen.

For the Crisis.

The Staple Error.

For many generations the doctrine of inherent immortality has been preached to the world. The Pagans knew nothing of the doctrine of the Resurrection, hence they readily cherished the fond idea of the soul's immortality in their system of philosophy. The doctrine took deep root in the Grecian mind. It received strength and notoriety from the teachings of such men as Socrates, Plato, and Pythagoras. These were men whose great minds grasped many noble truths, but without the light of revelation to guide them into the true knowledge of man's destiny, they grasped their way into darkness, and thus developed a system which has proved a stumbling block to all succeeding generations. When Papacy blended Paganism with its corrupt system of religion, the immortality of the soul received a prominent place in its creed. And at last, even the Protestant churches have come to sanction the idea—nay, closely adhere to it. Now, all over the land, thousands and tens of thousands believe in Satan's lie,—man thus shall never die.

For the Crisis.

"The Time is Short."

The time of probation on which hangs our eternal destiny, is short. It is passing swiftly away. Are we improving it for the great end for which it is given? Is our eternal life secured by obedience to the two great commands of the Almighty God, "Repent ye, and believe the gospel?"—Mark 1: 15. Does our repentance work godly sorrow for sin, or doth it need to be repented of, being unholy and selfish? Is our faith in the glorious gospel a holy, vital, operative principle; or does it leave us in communion with a carnal world, destitute of those fruits of the spirit of God, which are an earnest of the sacred joys of the everlasting inheritance?

The time for working in our Lord's vineyard, for his honor and glory, in the increasing sanctification of his redeemed, and the saving of our fellow men from everlasting death, is short, very short. Are we "exhorting one another (to holiness) daily, and so much the more as we see the day (of the Lord) approaching?" Are we faithful to dying men who may be eternally saved through our instrumentality? Are we, in accents of love, earnestly entreating them to come unto Him who gave his precious life to redeem them from everlasting death, in whose heart of love there yet is room for them?

The time of the conflict of the faithful soldier of Jesus Christ, who is valiant for the truth, and is willing to endure hardness for the Captain of his salvation, is short. Soon the victory will be gained and celebrated with joy unspeakable and full of glory! The toil and sorrows of the weary pilgrim to Mount Zion, shall soon terminate forever in the sweet rest of the Holy City, where the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb will be the everlasting light and the glory. Are we honoring our Father in heaven, by letting "patience have its perfect work" in our submissive minds? Do the trials of our faith—the "afflictions which are but for a moment," make us, by the grace of God, more reconciled to God, more watchful and prayerful, more dead to the present world, and thus work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory?

Finally, dear reader, are we daily increasing in those good works of practical love and self-denial, without which, all our religious knowledge and faith, and all our forms of godliness, are but as the sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal? Are we good stewards of the property the Lord has entrusted to us for the benefit of the poor and needy around us, especially such as are of the household of faith? Soon will he say unto us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it (or not done it) unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it (or not done it) unto me." The tremendous realities of eternity will soon burst upon us. HENRY GREW.

GOD UNCHANGEABLE.—There are many Christians like young sailors, who think the shore and the whole land do move, when the ship and they themselves are moved; just so, not a few imagine that God moveth, and faileth, and changeth places, because their godly souls are subject to alteration, but the foundation of the Lord abideth sure.—Rutherford.

Tread the Thorns Down.

"Tread lightly over trouble,
Tread lightly over wrong,
We only make grief double
By dwelling on it long.
Why clasp Woe's hand so tightly?
Why sigh o'er blossom's dead?
Why cling to forms unsightly?
Why seek not joy instead?"

From Ruth G. Bailey.

BRO. GRANT.—I have the pleasure of sending you one new subscriber for the next vol., and wish I could add more. I feel like heartily recommending the Crisis to the perusal of all my friends, and wish I could see them ready to rejoice with me in the precious truths it heralds forth. But alas! there are a portion of those whom we esteem as friends, so completely bound by the traditions of men as to see neither truth or comeliness in, what appears to us, plain Bible doctrine, and who are ready to toss aside these weekly messengers of mercy without even a slight perusal. The cry of my soul is, Oh! that they would be wise, and hearken to the voice of instruction and warning. But if they will not, we can only commit their cases to Him who overruleth all things. My desire is, so to walk that I may be classed among that "peculiar people," who are still watching for the return of the Nobleman. This is not because I love my old friends and all who show a christian spirit less, but that I love this blessed truth, and those identified with it more. As a shipwrecked crew, who have seen many of their number swept from the deck, while they through many perils and hardships, still survive, must feel a peculiar interest in one another;—so the few faithful ones who have outrode the storm of error and contention, and are still standing firm for truth, are dearer to one another than if their perils and trials of faith had been less.

Dear brethren and sisters, the haven of eternal rest is a little in the future. We are not a wrecked crew. Our Pilot will guide the ship, and if we are faithful in our duties, we shall soon reach home in safety.

NEW YORK, March 6.

Steamship Jura, from Liverpool 10 A. M., Feb. 18, has arrived at this port.

The war in Oude is over. The forts have been destroyed, and 400,000 stand of arms have been surrendered.

The Begum and Nana Sahib are supposed to have fled, with their followers, into Nepaul.

Tantia Topee has suffered three successive defeats, and in all directions the remnant rebels have been decimated.

The Sultan is angry with the people of the Danubian Principalities, and has a tolerably large body of soldiers on his own side of the river, but he knows better than to commence hostilities, and, therefore, appeals to a conference of the great powers. The conference is shortly to take place at Paris.

There is a dark spot in the East. There is, we are told, the possibility of a Turkish and Austrian army being marched into the Danubian Principalities, in order to prevent the Roumans from becoming a united people under Prince Cousa, their universally elected Hospodar. France, Russia and Piedmont will object to this, and England will probably support Austria and Turkey.

The Continental news again grows warlike. If the Emperor of the French is pacific, his cousin, Prince Napoleon, is decidedly warlike. The consequence is a marked division in the policy of the empire. The Presse had an article which alarmed the Council, and it was only after a warm discussion that a warning was given. The Prince protested against the proceedings. The Emperor, it is said, is desirous of emulating his uncle, and of tempting danger in the field of fight, and possibly Sardinia thinks he will, for in Piedmont the Court is for a passage of arms with Austria. There lies the danger, for Piedmont, by a sudden movement, can inaugurate a European war. Austria, however, is courteous towards France.

The Herald's Paris correspondent states that the whole army of Lyons has been placed on a war footing, and that its equipages de campagne have been ordered to be got in readiness without delay.

Orders have been given to the Chamber of Commerce to abstain from giving expression to their ardent wishes for peace.

The Ministerial warning given to the Presse has created a great sensation, and Rentes in consequence rose last night on the Boulevards 40 centimes. The article which led to the warning being given, contains the following passage: "Italy does not rely on her own unaided efforts to throw off the yoke of her oppressors. She invokes the co-operation of generous nations. Ought we not to welcome with gratitude the opportunity of putting a termination to the anxiety which torments Europe? Austria does not only raise her head everywhere in Italy, but also elsewhere. Would not a war which would deliver us from this nightmare be blessed above all other wars? Such, we believe, is the war preparing in Italy."

The correspondent of the Herald says the warning reached the Presse while it was on the printing machine, and as it contained another warlike article, still more violent, this had to be taken out, and the journal did not appear till 6.30 P. M.

It was reported in Paris that Baron Hubner threatened to demand his passports if he did not obtain satisfaction on account of the above articles, and that the proposal to give the Presse a warning, led to a violent discussion in the Cabinet Council, it being strenuously opposed by Prince Napoleon.

M. de Lesseps left Paris on the 15th for Alexandria, for the express purpose of commencing the Suez Canal.

SARDINIA.

The Paris correspondent of the Times asserts, on trustworthy ground, that the King of Sardinia is determined on making an attempt to drive the Austrians, with the object of constituting for himself a kingdom strong enough to resist Austria on the one hand, and France on the other, if need be, and that it will comprise Venice, and at least 12,000,000 subjects.

An absolute certainty is felt at the Court of Turin that France will help Piedmont against Austria, and that Russia will be with him passively, if Austria be left to fight alone, but actively and openly if any other power assists Austria. England and Prussia are expected to be neutral. The above is asserted to be the deliberate plan of the King of Sardinia and his Cabinet, and nothing but the withdrawal of France will divert them from it.

The news from the Danubian Principalities is considered of a serious character, and in that quarter which may be more difficult to deal with than the affairs of Italy.

A fresh despatch of troops to Constantinople was expected at that city.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The London Times of the 4th has a decided article on British relations with Mexico, in which it says, "we are inclined to think that the time has come when the honor and interests of England demand a stern interference." It adds "It is now stated on the highest authority that the British naval commander on the station has received instructions to demand, and, 'if necessary, to enforce, due reparation,' and we trust that, while reiterating, if necessary, to the whole world that we have no intention of adding one inch of Mexican ground to Her Majesty's territory, the government will not hesitate to use all the means in its power to support the just rights of the people it represents."

The project of the Post is a recommendation of the treaty of 1815. Let the powers of Europe fail to take this course, and though no declaration of war may be made, a collision on the frontier will arise. Piedmont is sure to be involved in hostilities with Austria, France will be bound to succor Piedmont, and the torch of war once lighted, no one can tell when it will be quenched.

To England there seems but one duty, that of saying energetically, that without war or any other disturbance of the general peace of Europe "Italy shall be free."

Advices by telegraph state that fighting has commenced in Montenegro. The Russians had been repulsed in an attempt to take the town of Ghelndjik, on the Circassian coast.

PERSONAL.—Kossuth is said to be in straitened circumstances, living on the proceeds of his lectures and contributions to newspapers, eked out by the remnant of his wife's $20,000, most of which was lost in railroad investments in the United States. The $100,000 collected by him in this country has all been expended on political objects, not a cent being appropriated by Kossuth for his own use. The great Magyar is said to look twenty years older than he did when in this country, seven years ago.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Randolph, Crawford Co., Pa., Jan. 24th, SARAH ARAMINTA, only daughter of Bro. Edw. Tyler, aged 15 years 6 months, of typhoid and lung fever.

Sister Araminta loved the blessed truth of the soon coming King, and the truths connected therewith. In July 15th, 1858, in company with quite a number of others, she went down into the liquid grave, showing her faith in Jesus and the resurrection. Little did we think then that Sr. Araminta would so soon be laid in the cold and silent dust. But she has gone, and we humbly trust will have a part in the morning of the resurrection, when Jesus who is our life shall appear. She leaves a number of friends to mourn her loss.

"Nature will mourn departing friends."

And in the language of her father, we say, our days, weeks, months and years, glide swiftly away, leaving little, save sorrow's trace behind. Yet "we sorrow not as those which have no hope," for soon we believe that Araminta will come again from the land of the enemy, and shine forth in the kingdom of our heavenly Father.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

Bro. J. Wendell of Edenboro, Pa., preached an interesting discourse to a large congregation, from Ps. 6: 4, 5.—"Return, oh Lord, deliver my soul: oh save me for thy mercies' sake. For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" JOHN T. ONGLEY.

Expositor, please copy.

Died, in Norway, Me., July 10th, 1858, ENOCH MERRILL, aged 77 years.

Bro. Merrill was a native of Andover, Mass. In early manhood he came to the woods of Maine to settle. Soon a revival commenced in Norway, where he settled, in which he shared, and was soon with others organized into a Baptist Church, of which he remained an exemplary member until he fell on sleep.

He leaves five sons and two daughters to mourn the loss of an affectionate father. Thus "man lieth down, and riseth not until the heavens be no more."

Died, of consumption, in Providence, Jan. 27th, 1859, Sr. LUCINDA D. TYLER, aged 32 years.

Sr. Tyler was converted and baptized in the spring of 1856, and from that time she rejoiced in hope. A family required her attention, so that she was confined much at home; but when she could meet with the saints, she was glad of the opportunity to speak of the Savior, and the hope she had through him. She leaves a circle of friends, of whom some, having faith in the Lord, do not mourn, as "others who have no hope." She died believing that she must rest in unconsciousness until Jesus comes and wakes the sleeping saints, and rejoicing in hope of being among them. The writer attended the funeral on Sunday, Jan. 30th, and endeavored to show that her hope would not be in vain. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."—Ps. 116: 15.

JOSEPH D. BROWN.

Died, in Brimfield, Mass., Jan. 10th, 1859, WILSON AINSWORTH, aged fourteen years and five months.

He sleeps in Jesus, and such will God bring with him.

"When shall the tedious night be gone?
When will our Lord appear?
Our fond desires would pray him down,
Our love embrace him here!"

J. E. AINSWORTH.

Died, in Bloomfield, Crawford Co., Penn., Oct. 21st, 1858, of consumption, CHARLES HENRY PORTER, only child of Samuel F. and Jane A. Porter, aged nineteen months.

Yes, he sleeps in yonder grave-yard,
By his little sister's side,
Sweet they sleep, and none can wake them
Till th' Archangel's trump shall sound.

C. M. PORTER.

Bro. Grant:—You are requested to publish the following lines. They have been altered a little from the original. L. J. Beach.

The Shining Shore.

My days are gliding swiftly by,
And I, a pilgrim stranger,
Would not detain them as they fly,—
Those hours of toil and danger.

Chorus.
For O, we stand on Jordan's strand,
We'll soon be passing over;
And just before, the shining shore
We can almost discover.

We'll gird our loins, my brethren dear,
Our future home discerning;
Our absent Lord has left us word,
Let every lamp be burning.
Cho.

Should coming days be cold and dark,
We need not cease our singing;
That perfect rest naught can molest,
Where golden harps are ringing.
Cho.

Let sorrow's rudest tempest blow,
Each chord of earth to sever;
Our King says come, and there's our home
Forever, O forever.

For the Crisis.

"The Great Question."

BY JOHN HOWELL.

(Concluded.)

IV. From the prominence given to the blessing of life in the ministry of Christ, the records of the evangelists, and of the apostles, we conclude that eternal life only through Christ is "THE GREAT QUESTION."

Said Jesus, "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me."—John 5: 39. From the 20th verse of this chapter to the 29th, he had clearly presented his hearers with the origin and means of eternal life. In the scripture we have quoted, he invites their most careful investigation to the only reliable source of information respecting life, and himself the medium through whom it could only be conferred. In verse 40th, he said to them,—"And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life;" showing the necessity of their coming to him, in order to live forever. Please read his discourse in John, chapters 4 and 5, 6, 7, 11, and it will be impossible for one to avoid the conviction, if they read with careful attention, that life through Jesus was no secondary question with him. Again, the evangelists attached great importance to this subject. For the sake of brevity I will only refer to John's Gospel. John 20: 30, 31.—"And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have LIFE through his name." Here then is the design of the evangelist; to prove the true relation of Christ to the God of the universe, and also his true relation to the believer only; namely, the relation of Life-Giver. Why this constant care to specify a distinct class, as that only upon which Christ would bestow life? Why did the great Apostle to the Gentiles in his epistle to the Romans, chaps. 2d, 5th, 6th, 8th; 2 Cor. 2: 14–16; 1 Cor. 15; and, indeed, speaking upon this subject more or less in all his epistles, as those to Timothy and Titus; I say, why did not the Apostle Paul in one instance, if it is true, intimate that the sinner without Christ would live forever, when he affirms that he had "not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God," and "I kept nothing back that is profitable for you?" And if it is not "the great question," why is such prominence given to the subject of eternal life in the entire New Testament, the epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude not excepted, and the book of Revelation?—Rev. 22: 14–19. Observe what John the beloved disciple has written on this point. 1 John 5: 10–13.—"He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made him a LIAR; because he believeth not the RECORD that God gave of his Son. And this is the RECORD, that God hath given to us eternal life, and THIS LIFE IS IN HIS SON. He that hath the Son, HATH LIFE: and he that hath NOT the Son of God, HATH NOT LIFE. These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God."

First. In this Scripture the apostle has introduced by inspiration, "the record that God gave of his Son." Its origin is amply sufficient to prove its importance. This "record" proceeded and came forth from God.

Secondly. Observe the facts contained in "the record." (1.) That eternal life is the gift of God.—"That God hath given to us eternal life."—(2.) The deposit of this gift. "And this life is in his Son.—(3.) The reception of the Son is absolutely indispensable to the possession of this life, that is, eternal life. "He that hath the Son hath life."—(4.) The consequence of not receiving the Son of God is, no eternal life. "And he that hath NOT the Son of God hath not life."—(5.) This record of facts given by inspiration, and therefore of the greatest importance, is presented for our knowledge and faith. Observe verse 13.—"That ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God." Can we know that we have eternal life, unless we know that we have received Christ? Can we know that we have received the Son of God, unless we believe "the record that God gave of his Son?"

Finally, the necessity of faith in this "record." Observe verse 10.—"He that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son." Let us transpose these sentences. "He that believeth not God, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son, hath made him a liar." Is not a question upon which depends the veracity of God, and the denial of which through unbelief makes him a liar, "The great question?" O that all may appreciate its magnitude sufficiently to seek eternal life through Christ, that we may not die "the second death," and being out of Christ, remain eternally dead! O how precious is the Son of God!

V. From the bearing the question of eternal life only through Christ has upon the economy of God, we determine it to be "THE GREAT QUESTION." It is in harmony with every Scripture truth, and every part of the work of redemption; while natural immortality or eternal life is at war with the Bible, and the work of redemption, as well with its author. What would become of the doctrine of the worship of saints and papal purgatory, if all would acknowledge the gospel truth of future life only by a resurrection from the dead? How quickly would men, designing men, be obliged to give up their work of making merchandise of souls, of granting indulgence to men who wish to carry out some nefarious plan, and then be carried safely through purgatorial fire by filling the coffers of the covetous with their gain.—2 Pet. 2: 1–3. If every man lives in the future independent of the resurrection, then the object for which it was instituted by the author of the divine economy, that is, to give "life," to permit the saints to be "ever with the Lord," could have been secured without such an event, and therefore it is unnecessary. The value of the work of Christ to the world is certainly materially diminished, and the wisdom of God in appointing his Son to die and rise again, in order to secure a resurrection for his followers, is certainly not very apparent, if it is not impeached. No future life without that event is the only true cause why it was instituted, and therefore to save the plan of redemption from being a failure while men are permitted to die, yea, appointed to die, Heb. 9: 27; God suffered his Son to die; and hence he said to John on the Isle of Patmos: "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore, amen; and have the keys of hell and of death."—Rev. 1: 18. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept."—1 Cor. 15: 20. By means of which our faith is not vain; we may be saved from our sins, Rom. 4: 25, the dead will be raised; "then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are" not "perished." But if Christ be not raised, then the opposite of this is true, and redemption's plan is a failure.

How much importance should be attached to a question upon which so much depends; that instead of detracting from the importance of other known Scripture truths, it expresses their truthfulness and increases their importance. For once admit the truth of future life only through Christ, and by being raised from the dead, and how important does the second advent of Christ to receive his saints appear. John 14: 1–3.—"I will come again and receive you unto myself;" object—"that where I am, there ye may be also." Please read 1 Thess. 4: 13–18. Life is dependent upon the resurrection; the resurrection dependent upon the second coming of Christ; therefore no future reward or punishment unless Jesus comes again. The kingdom and the judgment are alike dependent upon the same event.—1 Tim. 4: 1, 8. Then the apostle will receive his crown, and "all them also that love his appearing."

Again, the basis principle of that hydra-headed lie of Spiritualism, is the lie of the devil, or natural immortality, as taught by him in Eden—"Thou shalt not surely die." Take this away, and in its place put Scripture fact—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and Spiritualism gasps and dies. It would not be left either to peep or mutter, and hence supply no ghost stories with which to defend a sinking cause, no peeping wizard or muttering demon whose testimony could be arrayed against a "thus saith the Lord." Agitate, then, the question of the unconscious state of the dead, and destruction of the wicked, for in so doing you are advocating the question, which is emphatically recognized by the gospel as "the great question." The Bible declares that a dead man knows nothing, and that the end of the wicked is destruction, and hence cease not to preach it, for in so doing you are only declaring the counsel of God. Life, eternal life only through Christ, is the gospel message, as much as Jesus' coming, the judgment, the kingdom of God, the restitution of the earth, the resurrection of the dead, or the holiness essential to secure the above blessings, and to prepare us to meet the most solemn event.

It is "the great question" that bestows upon God the honor and worship due to him, that is now bestowed upon canonized saints; that, if received, destroys the horrible work of the immolation of infants, and that stains the Ganges with the blood of human sacrifices. It closes purgatory forever, and extinguishes the last vestige of its imaginary flames. It confers upon God the benevolence of character which his word everywhere declares, without arraying that benevolence against a principle of barbarity, evinced by the vindictiveness exhibited in designedly perpetuating life to torment the sinner in fire and brimstone, while, as one has said, he "gnaws his flesh from the bone, and devils claw it from his body." It robs universalism of its strong hold, and makes him who believes it feel that God will bring him into judgment. Admit that he has immortality without a compliance with the Gospel, the very thing that inspiration declares we obtain by such a compliance, and he entertains no fear. The possession of immortality, no matter how it is obtained, is a certain pledge of endless life; and as the Scriptures affirm that its possessor is forever blessed, he who has it need fear no trouble. Therefore the Author of it has reserved it exclusively for the good. It is the blessing upon which depends the possession and enjoyment of every Scripture blessing, and therefore to be sought for "by patient continuance in well doing," and in the end conferred to secure eternal life to the seeker.—Rom. 2: 6, 7.

As before suggested, natural immortality is the foundation principle of "Spiritualism." In a recent discussion which the writer of this had with one of its champions, he affirmed this to be the case, and that one prominent reason why we need new revelations is, because the Bible did not teach it, that is, that "man is immortal." Take it away then, and no other alternative is left for the Spiritualist, but that all is the work of devils, demons. Then the thousands who flock to its standard, supposing the spirits to be their veritable friends and connections, will halt, yea, have the seductive charm forever broken, and perhaps be saved to live forever through that Savior Spiritualists now seem to deride with delight.

Finally, then, we conclude that the fact of no future life after the present, ONLY through Christ, is "the great question," from a consideration of the magnitude of the subject it sets forth, that is, eternal life,—from the great amount dependent upon its truth or falsity,—the practical result secured by its agitation,—its bearing upon other questions of known truth, exhibiting the importance of the second advent of Christ, and the resurrection,—the necessity of the resurrection in order to there being a future judgment, and the carrying out of the divine purpose of conferring a kingdom upon eternally living men, and from the fact that it is the subject of divine revelation. By it the love of God is manifested, his will expressed, Jesus given in proof of its necessity, from the relation that man sustains to the blessing and its author, that is, of absolute dependence, the prominence given to the subject in the inspired volume, and the bearing it has upon the entire economy of God. Then, while we will not hesitate to preach the coming of Jesus, resurrection, restitution of the earth, etc., enforcing the necessity of a preparation upon all, by making these questions practical, let us never for a moment, from any sinister motive whatever, cease to present to dying men the great motive of eternal life, and the only means through which it can possibly be secured.

Dear sinner, if you will live forever, make Christ your all, and heartily receive him as your Savior. Let no syren song of peace in the future, lull you to sleep while on the very brink of destruction without Christ. Let nothing decoy you from the pursuit of eternal life. You love a temporary one, oh, seek a life that will be endless; endless life with God, with Christ, with seraphim, cherubim, angels, and the good of all ages, and of all climes. Life without a pain, a sigh, a tear, a grief, without a separation from friends. Life in eternal loveliness and beauty, in an earth made new, in which "dwelleth righteousness." Oh! seek such a life, and you will receive ample compensation for all its gain may cost you. May the blessing of God aid you, dear sinner, to begin this pursuit at once, is the fervent prayer of the writer.

To the church let me just say, let us live in a manner becoming our high calling, and cause others to feel that we appreciate the life we would have them seek, by making it our life's pursuit. May the peace of God be with you all. Amen.

For the Crisis.

Labors in the West.—A Tempest.—Revivals, etc.

Bro. Grant.—I have not written a letter for the Crisis for quite awhile, but trust I have not been for that an idler in the vineyard. The quiet, patient, plodding work of the pastorate is quite different from evangelistic labors, which I performed last year. The church in Ottawa, however, I regret to say, unblest with a general revival, has nevertheless been permitted to rejoice in the frequent conversion and addition of one or two, or more, at a time, through the winter; and here most of my time has been spent for the winter. Have spent one Sabbath with the Church in Vermillionville, where I found Eld. Calkins in feeble health and the church in a rather low estate, though I think they have since taken heart and are doing better—are living. Have once visited Iowa: spent about two days in the city of Muscatine, and, I trust, to good effect; was offered the Baptist meeting-house, in which Eld. J. Cummings—late a preacher amongst us—now preaches. Congregation small at first, but afterward crowded; attention excellent; and a few converted or reclaimed from backslidings; much prejudice seemed removed, and I thought there was a good prospect of a revival. Our dear Bro. Covill—a pillar of the cause in that region, with numerous friends in the region, seemed greatly quickened and encouraged. May the Lord bless them, and the dear brethren of the Baptist Church, whose christian kindness and hospitality we so largely shared. I hope Muscatine may yet give you a large list of subscribers for the Crisis.

Saturday, left home to spend a short time with the Christian Church of Green Garden—per invitation of its venerable pastor, Eld. N. Johnson. Left the cars at 7 1-2 o'clock in the evening; then had four or five miles to travel on the prairie; found a gentleman waiting for me at the depot, with horses which we were to ride the remainder of the journey. By a quick change, from the pleasant, single day's sleighing we had had, the weather had become warm as June, and the mud on the prairies had become so deep that our roads were nearly impassable. As we left Joliet in the former part of the evening, the windows and doors of our houses were thrown open,—the in-doors song school through the streets,—children were sporting in the open windows,—the men had removed their chairs into the piazzas, and all seemed ecstatic with a freer and more genial life than is at all common to winter in this latitude. But now a change seemed probable. And, to add to the gloom of a ride four or five miles on horse-back, over the prairies, in a mud comparing well with a mortar-bed, and that without one light, even of the moon,—the heavens had been suddenly overcast with clouds, making it extremely dark. My friend, having the largest and fastest horse, kept somewhat ahead; but, though so dark, I could just discern him, as if against the distant horizon.

Such was the aspect when, leaving the little Depot village, we directly launched out upon the open, i. e., unfenced prairie; and ah, what a time for meditation! What darkness this! Can that "outer darkness," the doom of the damned, be more dreadful than this? Doubtless it will; but oh, God! save my soul from such a doom, I pray. But now came thunder, with the lightning that for some time had flashed in the distance. I urged up my nag, overtook my friend and guide, and remarked I feared yon cloud, though less dark—for it is not the darkest clouds that carry the most force,—I feared it would give us a shower. He "thought not." But, in less than five minutes, the big rain drops came, and with them the boisterous, bellowing winds—and then such a tempest! I think it was never my fortune to experience. Our loneliness on the open prairie, the awful darkness, the gleaming lightning, the thunder, with cloud and rain, made the scene most terrific. I tried to raise my umbrella; but, before succeeding in this, my little horse had twice turned round, unwilling to face the storm; and in a remarkably short space of time, I found myself wet through and through. Felt very sensibly the weather had changed.

Fortunately the rain did not last long; and we had now but to patiently pursue our journey and our meditation. Ofttimes did I think of the loved ones around the genial fireside at home; and was glad they did not know but I was in as good a case as themselves. Ignorance is bliss sometimes. Yes, and did I not thank God that my dear family had a home. Oh, to be homeless! God forgive me if, at any time, I have murmured in that I had not a better home! A home is bliss, be it never so homely, in such a time. And did I not think of Him who came a pilgrim on the world's highway, without where to lay his head? And does my mission in any sense compare with His? That may be; but how little compares the missionary. Oh, God, give me a better heart. And not only this; I thought, too, of the storm, that awful storm of well-deserved wrath, that now has been so long gathering, and is so shortly to burst upon a devoted, God-hating, blaspheming world. And then who, yes who, shall have a home, "a covert from the storm?" Grant it to us.

About 9 o'clock reached the pilgrim home of Eld. Johnson, and, you may believe, was thankful.

Monday, Feb. 21. Had a good meeting yesterday. Also appointments for service at 11 o'clock, A. M., and 7 P. M., to-day. Hope for salvation. Yours,

P. B. Morgan.

The Law of Love.

2 Kings 4: 3.

Pour forth the oil,—pour boldly forth;
It will not fail, until
Thou failest vessels to provide
Which it may largely fill.

Make channels for the streams of love,
Where they may broadly run;
And love has ever flowing streams,
To fill them every one.

But if at any time we cease
Such channels to provide,
The very founts of love for us
Will soon be parched and dried.

For we must share, if we would keep
That blessing from above;
Ceasing to give, we cease to have;—
Such is the law of love.

—R. C. Trench.

Christian Peace.

Have any of you happened to see the effect of a breeze on a pool of deep water in a sheltered valley? The wind may be sharp enough to ruffle the face of the water for awhile; but its depths are at peace. So is it with the christian. The cares and worries of life cannot pierce below the surface of his spirit; for he is lying beneath the shelter of his Savior; and so the depths of his heart are safe from every common trouble and annoyance. Nothing earthly can shake his soul, unless it be one of those heavy storms and whirlwinds of affliction, with which it sometimes pleases God to try the patience of his servants. But God never takes his children beyond their power; so that, when he tries them with some heart-searching grief, he at the same time sends them strength to bear it. Apart however from these heavy heart-searching woes, which befall us, God be praised, very rarely, the Christian enjoys great peace. To a mind like his, a mind at ease in itself, and feeding on the promises of its God and Savior, what matter those outward grievances and distresses, which harass and trouble the children of this world? Truly they are little more to him, than the rattling of the hail on the tiles to a man sitting by a good fire with a plentiful meal before him. If the man takes notice of the storm out of doors, it is only to say how glad he is to be out of it. So, if the Christian notices those cares and crosses, which his worldly neighbors make so much of, it is only to thank God for having called him to a covert from the gales of life, and placed him in a safe and sheltered haven.—Hare.

God's Providence.

I believe the Lord has always, ready provided, some kind Samaritan, journeying, as if by chance, on the very road where the wounded traveler lies, and who arrives just at the very moment when "oil and wine" are especially needed. I believe, too, that the Lord, in the workings of that providence which is over all his works, and which suffereth not a sparrow nor a hedgeling to fall to the ground unpermitted of him, whenever he has a bruised and torn one of his flock needing a tenderer hand than usual to nurture and to heal it, has that hand ready to stretch out and help—has one close at hand to supply the want—one whose own heart has been, perhaps, touched and prepared by sorrow for the especial work of sympathy with some other torn and sorrowing one of the family. We are apt to say of such apparently accidental circumstances, "How very fortunate!" but faith lifts up the curtain and sees God's hand at work, and cries out, "It is of the Lord's mercies!"—Rev. B. Bouchier.

Health and Longevity.

The Young Convert* and a Cigar!

OR, TWENTY REASONS FOR DROPPING TOBACCO.

Young Friend! When I saw you the other day enveloped in tobacco-smoke, you assured me you would drop your cigar, and use no more, if I would give you good reasons for dropping it. I seize on the first opportunity to do this, with the hope that God will bless the reasons I may give, that you and other converts of this revival may escape a lust which tends "to drown men in perdition." I shall be plain and direct; you said, the plainer the better.

Drop this habit, my friend, because it involves a waste of time. The Earl of Stanhope maintains that the users of tobacco spend two years of forty, or a twentieth part of time, in the indulgence. Be this as it may, you will concede that very much goes in this direction—too much, considering the little good attained, and the high value of time. "Millions of money," said a dying queen, "for an inch of time." I said to a young convert, "Where is your cigar?" In a hearty burst of joy he replied, "I love my Savior and fellow-men so well, I have no time for tobacco!" May love, holy love, overflow your soul, and produce the same change!

Drop it, because it leads to a sinful expenditure of money. You use cigars of a high price; your habit is expensive; some young men, less able, spend from twenty-five to fifty dollars annually. You perhaps spend seventy-five or more; this would give bread to a family of children, half support a colporteur, and, well invested, in a few years build a missionary ship, a "Morning Star!" Our missionary boards send out wailings long and loud for money. Are you innocent whilst consuming so much on cigars? Said a young man, who had given up his cigars, "I find my pockets heavier." Thousands might say the same.

Drop the habit in all forms, because tobacco is a rank poison, adapted to injure the whole body. Dr. Shaw has specified eighty or more diseases which may be traced to this as a cause. Its direct tendency is to discolor, defile, emaciate, emasculate, enfeeble and undermine the whole man. Your body you should yield a living sacrifice to God. The temple of the Holy Ghost! Have you a right to sin against the temple any more than against the great Occupant of the temple?

Drop it, because it tends to injure your mind. It acts on mind through the nerves, and renders its efforts unequal and comparatively unsafe. It enfeebles memory, jostles judgment, and often induces idiocy and right-out insanity. Smoking is a soporific process; with many for the time it produces total paralysis of mind, or an oblivious state. Glance at a bar-room after dinner, and those sons of smoke, those dreamy, boozy devotees, will give you some idea of intellect essentially a blank,—intellect lost to God, and all things useful.

Drop it on the score of cleanliness. Cleanliness, says Whitefield, is next to godliness. The impurity of tobacco, contaminating our common air and common walks, is manifestly a sore evil, and signs, "No Smoking, No Chewing Here," which now so often meet the eye, significantly assure us that the Nuisance is stirring up public indignation. "If young gentlemen must smoke," said Daniel Webster, "let them take the horse-shed." Put it to vote anywhere among people of genuine refinement and virtue, and, my word for it, smokers and chewers would all receive pretty much the same doom!

Drop it that, as a young christian, you may show where you stand. By profession, you belong to "a peculiar people;" but your habit tends to destroy this badge, and place you on a level with mournful specimens of the race. The vilest smoke! blackguards smoke; little, ragged, dingy, thieving boys smoke! A touch from Horace Greeley does justice to this point. "I do not say every smoker or chewer is a blackguard; but show me a blackguard who is not a lover of tobacco, and I will show you two white blackbirds." Young friend, hear the Savior's voice, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate," saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing!

Drop it—it tends to make drunkards. Do not suppose yourself safe on the temperance score so long as you smoke: We might show you physiologically, and show you by the testimony of such physicians as Rush, Woodward, Muzzy, Twitchell, and Warren, that tobacco paves the way to alcoholic intemperance. Its affinities are manifest. Said an Indian, "I want three things—all the rum there is in the world, all the tobacco there is in the world, then more rum!" The dialect of the toper in dram-shops is instructive: "I smoke because it makes me love to drink so." "I drink because it makes me love to smoke so." "I drink to wet my whistle, I smoke to dry it." Thus united, my brother, are these enormous evils. May God enable young converts to escape the miseries both inflict; may they see in the past that intemperance has been a mighty whirlpool in the destruction of souls, often clothing our churches in sackcloth!

Drop it, if you would be a christian freeman and not a slave. The victims of the habit confess their bondage; they confess their idol has their first thoughts in the morning, and their last thoughts at night; and some in their extravagance say, "We would give worlds if we could break from this tyrant!" With many the appetite for tobacco is a monstrosity!—a predominant passion! A woman in Essex county, Mass., supposed to be a christian, called for her snuff-box in her dying agonies, on the very border of eternity; weeping friends witnessed her passion strong in death! Frail sister! she did not bring the idol into the world, and it is certain she did not carry it out.

Be a freeman, my brother. Say, with Dr. Wood, "I would as soon be a chattel slave on a plantation, as a slave to tobacco!"

Drop it—it is a selfish habit, and will do to your heart pretty much what it will do to your body. It will tend to wither and narrow it up to small dimensions, extinguish its benevolence, and bid you seek at every turn your own comfort, not others. I state a fact. A smoker entered a stage coach; "Ladies," he said, "Ladies, I hope my cigar will not be offensive."—"Yes, yes," was the reply; "it will be very offensive." He gave a significant nod, muttering, "'Tis so to some;" and SMOKED ON. Say not this was a rare case, and this smoking dandy was a brute; every smoker and chewer, who obtrudes the nuisance on others, displays in principle the same selfishness.

Drop it—christian self-denial demands it. You are to forsake all for Christ. This may be the most self-sacrificing act of your life, and the very criterion to judge whether or not you follow Christ in the crucifixion. Said a young convert, "I will drop tobacco if it takes the flesh from my bones." He conquered, and is on his way rejoicing. Said another, bent on victory, "O, this gnawing appetite! It seems to me I can't live till night!" He also conquered, and is the happier. He lives, and I think will live forever. Go thou and do likewise.

Drop it, and be an example to others. Having espoused the cause of Christ, you are a spectacle to men and angels; your companions see you smoke, and they smoke; you endorse their lust, and confirm them in sin. Many old professors, as well as young, have renounced their quids and pipes, and reap the advantages. I pray you do the same. Let your example be safe. Cigars may stand in the way of the salvation of many a young man. Says a college officer, "When anxious for salvation, my cigars stood in my way, and delayed my submission to God; my cigars were the last idol I surrendered." Away with such stumbling-blocks; they cause your brother to offend.

Drop it, because it is an unreasonable self-indulgence. You do not pretend that you are sick, and use it medicinally; you do not pretend that it does you any substantial good; and hence, in using a thing so nauseous and poisonous, are you not unreasonable? Dr. Franklin says, "You ask why I do not use tobacco? I answer, I never saw a man of sense who pretended it did him any good. Why should I use it?" Dr. Rush speaks of angels gazing with astonishment on rational beings puffing this noxious smoke! You, my brother, have been born again, we hope. If so, angels have rejoiced! Give up this idol, get your mates to give it up, and I dare say angels will rejoice again!

Drop it, because it is to be classed among the wiles of Satan. The evil in its workings is insidious and satanic; it depresses the noble passions, and raises the sensual. Of all the agents of the devil in destroying young men, says Dr. Harris, tobacco is the master-piece, because it is so insidious.—Centuries ago, Indians on this continent worshiped devils; Indian priests got drunk on tobacco smoke, and in this state they held communion with their deities; and when the fit of intoxication had passed, they would make known to the savages about them the responses of their deities—the responses of devils! Alas! these poor Indians sacrificed to devils, and not to God; and we would not that young converts should have fellowship with devils!

Drop it—it is a narcotic which will deaden your sensibilities, and abridge your powers as a christian. Many professors, otherwise excellent men, are stupefied and stultified by it, and you would do them no injustice, should you write on their foreheads, DEAD, BUT NOT BURIED! O, let your first love glow with increasing power, and God forbid that you should add to the number of disciples who are too stupid to know the cause of their stupidity! Filthy dreamers that defile the flesh!

Drop it—it may lead you to apostatize from Christ. Strong drink has done this with multitudes, and this narcotic, seizing on the soul with more power than strong drink ever can, may do the same. Such attachment you may acquire for it that it may become a vast absorbent, a vast sponge to sponge up the heart; and, Christ being displaced, apostasy follows, of course. "We have," says a lady in Connecticut, "enjoyed a precious revival in our village, which embraced a large group of young men; some run well; others have apostatized and dishonored Christ; but every backslider," she adds, "without exception, is a victim of tobacco in some form." "A just recompense of reward!"

Drop it, that you may do your best to drive the evil from the world. You are young, you love enterprise, and you cry, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Here is work enough, pioneer work, which few will do; hence it is the most honorable. * * * Give up this fashionable vice, and write "Holiness to the Lord" on yourself and your possessions.

Drop this habit, for it may be your death. What are half the cases of delirium tremens, apoplexy and paralysis, but results from this cause? What are half the sudden deaths, chronicled in newspapers, and ascribed to heart-disease, but the same? German physicians tell us that of the deaths in Germany of young men, from the age of eighteen to twenty-five, more than half are from tobacco! Smoking burns up their flesh and blood!

Three young men formed a smoking club, and they all died within two years of the time they formed it. The doctor was asked what they died of. He said they were smoked to death.

This is fashionable suicide, but I beg you do not commit it, however fashionable.

Drop it, because it is a sin. It violates the laws of life by injuring the BODY, MIND and SOUL; and in doing this, it injures the whole man, in all his similitude to God, and is a sin; and sin you profess to hate. This is a sin of your own choice, not a sin of Adam; not a sin in the abstract, visionary and undefinable, but such as the offender can be easily convicted upon at once; a sin which wastes time, property, health, strength, beauty, and life,—a crime against nature; and a crime against divine law, written in God's book of nature, is a crime against God. I am sorry to say, some church members and "divines," devotees to the "weed," laugh in their chains, and make a mock at sin in this tangible form, whilst they "strain at a gnat" touching some other sins, which, in comparison, are of flea-bite magnitude.

Begin right, young friend. There is a RIGHT and a WRONG, irrespective of the notions of men, good or bad; and the clear light of coming times will show that the use of this RANK POISON over nations is an evil which no man can exaggerate, because an evil so great no man can measure. Drop this habit, therefore, because it is WRONG, morally WRONG; and I beg you and all tobacco-using converts to understand, that if you will not quit a wrong thing because it is wrong, you will not do a right thing because it is right, and moral principle, the sublimest element in God, has no place in your creed or scheme of existence.

With many, I admit, it is a sin of ignorance, and the ignorance of former times God winked at; but you have light, and if now you continue to hug your idol, must we not conclude that your hope is a false hope, and that you have nothing to commend you to God, or guard you against the temptations of life? George Trask.

Christian Warfare.

"For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.
Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand."—EPH. 6: 12, 13.

It is always desirable for kingdoms, as well as individuals who are going to war, to ascertain what sort of an enemy they have to contend with—his strength, resources, the nature of his weapons and his mode of attack or defence. Heavy disasters and ultimate defeat have frequently arisen from the underrating of a foe, either on account of numerical inferiority or half armed condition. Hannibal, the famous Carthagenian general, while addressing his hemmed in soldiers, said, "A despised enemy oft gives a bloody battle; and kingdoms have, by a small force, been overthrown." It would be madness to attempt the breaching of a wall with a charge of bayonets, and it would be equally futile to attempt the discomfiture of the kind of enemies which the apostle here describes, with the carnal weapons of our own edifice, or in the pigmy force of our own strength.

Man contending with his fellow may hope, by using like weapons, to overthrow him; but the christian's warfare is a more severe struggle, and requires the assistance of a mightier power than that of earth, "for we wrestle not with flesh and blood." 'Tis true that the followers of Jesus have ever been persecuted by the world; but there is an unseen moving power, hostile to God, which employs mortal agents to throw impediments in the way of truth and holiness, by intimidation, and cruelty towards those who preach the pure gospel of Christ.

In that tremendous struggle, when Satan,
"Warring against heaven and heaven's matchless King,"
found, to his irrecoverable loss, that impious strokes aimed at the Omnipotent fell back upon himself; therefore he sought open fight no more with one unconquerable and dread. Hurled from that giddy height of splendor, from whence "pride and worse ambition threw him down," he and his comrades vile, while wallowing in the dark abyss, in secret planned the fall of hapless man. This new creation of the feared and hated God, so favored and so beautiful, presented a medium through which the vindictive fiend could wage a war, destructive and prolonged, against the King of kings. He knew that man, so perfect, so majestic, was, like the angels, free to stand or fall. Whether the relation of the temptation be metaphorical or literal, we cannot say; but, alas! the dreadful deed was too well executed, and if tears could ever dim an angel's eye, seraphim looked on and wept. The exulting adversary, gloating over the ruin he had made, started and gnashed his teeth when God's eternal Son, more hated even than the Father, arrested the swoop of judicial vengeance, offering himself as a propitiation for trembling man. Four thousand years of ceaseless warfare marked the ferocious energy of the one, and the long-suffering love of the other. At length the wayward and rebellious nature of the human family rendered Justice impatient for the sacrifice, and "the word was made flesh" that He might die.

Now all the fury of the evil one was aroused, and, using Herod as his tool, he sought to quench in blood the light of that bright star which shone on the plains of Bethlehem. Failing in this, the audacious tempter endeavored to corrupt the second Adam as he had done the first, through his appetite. He then tried presumption, ambition and idolatry, but failed in all of them, baffled and enraged.

Fiercer and closer grew the conflict. Unsparingly the devil drove the Son of God to solitude, to prayer and tears. Then comes the agony and bloody sweat, the scourging, the thorns and the cross. And the flush of pride and exultation lights up the grim visage of the fiend, as he plants his foot upon the stone, beneath which lies the bleeding victim.

"Alas, for man if he should not arise!
While o'er that sacred body brooded death,
Angels and seraphim in upper skies,
And in the dark abyss, fiends held their breath.

Short is the destroyer's triumph. Down, like a ray of light, darts a swift messenger of heaven. The serpent, coiled upon the sealed tomb, sees the bright visitant, and drags his most hideous form away, while the mailed guards of Cæsar are smitten to the earth. The stone is rolled back, and from the fragrant grave comes forth the conqueror of death! The plan for man's redemption was now perfected—the prestige of hades broken, and he who had trod the dark valley alone, issues triumphant from the cheerless realms of his beaten foe. Ere he ascends to heaven, he tells his followers that he shall come again and take them to himself; and they are comforted.

Persecution after persecution follow by pagan then by papal Rome; but all the instruments which satan can employ are not sufficient to uproot the precious seed. It spreads, and grows, and ripens yet, despite the tares and thorns which would choke and kill it; and when the sickles of the reaping angels are applied, an abundant harvest shall be gathered into the garner of the Lord. Wickedness hates the dawn of day, and "the rulers of the darkness of this world" use every effort to shut out the bright beams of the revealed truth of God. Man's Adversary would gladly compromise the matter, by putting opaque glasses upon ministers and hearers, too dim to see objects distinctly; or else flame-colored lenses to frighten the soul from love by a horrid contemplation of roaring fires of eternal woe. He dare not let the sinner see the true character of his Maker, else, per force, he might throw down his rebel arms, and bow submissively before so good a being. Therefore he raises some of his servants to high dignities in the church, who for the thousand dollars they receive, apply the infidel-making lever of "hell-fire" doctrine, and cant thousands of their fellows over the precipice of everlasting destruction.

But the healing unction of the Divine Word is being applied, and many who a little while ago were in the deepest moral darkness, now "see men, as trees, walking," while not a few are rejoicing in the glad light of a clear, full, gospel day. The sterling nature of the doctrine which we defend, may be appreciated by seeing the rabid opposition on every hand, through which, at every turn, the "cloven foot" appears. It is marvelous to perceive the amount of capital which the devil has invested in the various denominations, who pretend to the name of christian; for no sooner does Truth show her brilliant head, than surplices, bands, stoles and vestments are thrown upon her, to smother her up, and she is assailed by prayer books, "articles of faith," etc., from all parties; and the old fat pope, after throwing his triple mitre at her, strives to beat her to death with his crook. But it wont avail. She rises superior to all the opposition of men and devils, bright, glorious, resplendent and invincible; for her soldiers have taken unto themselves the whole armor of God, and shall withstand in the evil day. Their loins are girt with truth, and righteousness is upon their breast. Peace goes with their footsteps, and they bear the shield of faith, from which the fiery darts of satan fall blunted and innoxious. The hemlet of salvation is upon their head, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, is in their hand. Jesus is their captain, and the victory is sure.

Church Order.

BRO GRANT:—Much has been said and preached of late about order. This is all right, for of a truth God is a God of order, and if there is one place on the footstool of God where order should prevail above another, it is in the church of God.

The question has arisen in my mind of late, why is it that there is so little order among us? After considering it candidly, I have come to the conclusion that a large share of the blame rests upon the ministry. Certainly those that preach order the most, should practice the most, and be the first to practice it.

First of all, I think there ought to be some system about appointments; there has been a great lack, on the part of many, on this point. (I speak not of all.) It appears to me to be entirely out of order for preachers to send a chain of appointments to the Crisis, or otherwise, for country places, without first consulting or corresponding with the brethren in such places. It is a well known fact that the means of the Adventists, generally, are very limited; and where there are but half a dozen or a dozen in a place, it is quite a tax for them to support preaching half of the time; then to have others send appointments between their regular appointments, or, as it frequently occurs, upon the same Sabbath, making a clash, as is the case almost every week, places both the brethren and the preachers themselves under very embarrassing circumstances, under which preaching can do but little good, compared to what it otherwise would.

We intend, by the help of the Lord, to sustain preaching in Winsted, once in two weeks on the Sabbath. We welcome our preaching brethren here, if they will but comply with our request; viz., correspond with Bro. Ira T. Neal, West Winsted, Ct.; then notice can be duly given, the word freely preached, and we that are taught in the word can communicate to him that teaches; we be edified, God glorified, and the minister go on his way rejoicing.

As ever, looking for the consummation of the blessed hope, JOHN F. BAKER.

Languishing Zion.

"By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion."—Ps. 137: 1.

To-day my feeling heart is sad,
Borne down with heavy grief;
Where is a voice to make me glad?
A look, to give relief?

If sinners would the Lord embrace,
And seek a glorious crown,
Then I would wear a smiling face,
And lay my burden down.

But they are thoughtless, vain and gay,
On ruin's crumbling brink;
Yielding to sin's enticing sway;
Nor will they stop to think.

And those who call themselves the saints,
Were they exempt from guile,
Then I would silence my complaints,
And wear a heavenly smile.

But now I see them drinking in
The joys of sinful mirth,
As eager as the world, to win
The wealth and fame of earth.

O Lord, may not thy spirit leave
The careless sons of men,
O hear thy sorrowing children grieve,
And bless thy church again.

The Advent.

Being young in the advent faith, and with quite a limited knowledge of prophecy and history, cannot with confidence make computations from chronology, and satisfy my mind by figures, as to the time when the Scriptures will all be fulfilled in regard to the earth, or present state. For definite or proximate time derived from chronology and history, I am dependant upon the computations of others, whose knowledge of history, and prophecy, and chronology enables them to compute the time to their satisfaction, and yet in consequence of my own ignorance, their opinions (although they may be demonstration to their own minds) cannot, in the nature of the case, be so convincing to me. Hence, my convictions of the nearness of the time are derived, not from chronology so much as from the signs which are foretold by our Lord, especially in the 24th Matthew. When I read that prediction, and mark the signs which he has given—the darkening of the sun in 1780, the falling stars in 1833, the political convulsions which are described as the powers of heaven being shaken, and the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and then read these words: "So likewise ye, when ye see all these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the door;" and "this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled"—I conclude it must be nigh at hand; for it is now seventy-nine years, or nearly so, since the first of these signs, viz.: the darkening of the sun; and if the generation who saw that sign shall not all pass away until all be fulfilled, the conclusion in my mind is, that the time must be at hand—even at the door. For if those now living who saw that sign are more than eighty years old, they must, in the nature of things, very soon pass away; and yet, if I understand it, they are not all to pass away before the end.

Again. If we have not yet seen the SIGN of the Son of man in heaven, (perhaps we have,) it would seem that we should very soon see it, and then what?—"And then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn when they shall see THE SON OF MAN coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." If the sign of the Son of man has been seen, who can doubt the end may come at any day, almost! I would not dare to say, "my Lord delayeth his coming."

I have often thought that these predictions in Matthew, Luke and Mark are for the benefit and warning of such disciples as are not chronologists, so that they may have a sure word of prophecy, which may be understood by them more readily than chronological calculations, for which they are not competent. There is no view of this subject which gives convictions to my mind with such force as these predictions of our Lord. They were the first solid convictions of my experience in the faith of our Lord's speedy coming—and they are to this day the strongest. W. S. O.

Prophecy.—No. 2.

Although Daniel fasted, prayed, and received in answer to his prayers the ministry of angels; yet when he would push his inquiry further than the purposes of Infinite Wisdom saw fit to explain to him, he was told to go his way, the words were closed and sealed up till the time of the end. It is utterly futile to peer into the dark future, further than the prophetic lamp lights up the way. "As a light shining in a dark place," only lights a little way ahead, beyond which we can only discern the dim outlines of surrounding objects; yet we see distinctly the point we occupy, also, in splendid contrast to the surrounding gloom, the beacon light on the hill-top, indicating the locality of home, "sweet home," and if, with bounding heart and quickened pulse, we should anticipate the intervening slopes of hills, and the long valley between, yet we must travel over them with patient toil. Arguing that they are not there, will not annihilate the distance!

Homeward bound pilgrim, be patient; the whole length of the prophetic road must be trodden before we reach the goal. Hasting unto the coming of the Lord will not hasten the event. If we cry "how long?" as yet the answer comes back, yet a little season until—until what? until that which is written be fulfilled!!

If we would rightly understand symbolic prophecy, we must occupy the right stand-point of observation. For instance; if we would understand the symbol of the woman and her judgment, (Rev. 17,) we must assume the right stand-point—"the wilderness." Yes, but what does the wilderness mean? The wilderness state of the church, say many. We will tread carefully—a light in a dark place, remember.

We will notice, first, it is the judgment of the harlot that claims attention. Second, it is when her "cup is full;" and third, when she is carried on the back of a "scarlet beast," and that beast is in his transit from the bottomless pit into perdition.—Rev. 11: 7, and 17: 8. Then again the informing angel is one of the seven angels having the seven last plagues. Now they do not receive those vials until the tabernacle of the testimony is opened in heaven; they are then seen coming out of the temple, and no man can enter the temple till these plagues are fulfilled; for in them is filled up the wrath of God.

If some one "who hath wisdom" will tell us what we are to understand by the opening of the temple in heaven, and the chronology of that event; it will determine whether the angel (one of the seven angels which had the vials,) is prepared to say, "Come hither, and I will show thee the judgment of the harlot." If that event is in the past, then we may with propriety go back to the wilderness state of the church: if in the future, then we must wait for the instructing angel to lead us to some place of uninterrupted observation, as one of these angels takes John up into a mountain to show him the Bride, the lamb's wife.—Rev. 22: 10. Theory and Practice.

What constitutes a christian? Is it one that has a good theory, and contends for it from day to day with all the zeal possible? Yes, if he has other characteristics to put with it, but if he has not, his theory will not constitute him a christian by any means. Unless a person carries his theory into practice, he is nothing more than a "heathen man and a publican." It is an easy thing to talk about religion, but not as easy to talk religion itself. Why do we see such a state of affairs in the professed church, even in Western New York? It is not because theory is lacking, for there is enough to save all, from the least to the greatest; but it is because theory is not carried into practice. This exists to an alarming extent amongst those that call themselves "Adventists." They have the most theory of any class of professors, and where there is the most theory, there should of necessity be the most practice, but to a great extent it is not so. We find many that will leave their labor to argue on the near coming of Christ, saint's inheritance, sleep of the dead, destruction of the wicked, and many other subjects, which is all very well, but come to compare their theory with their daily walk, and we find engraven in unmistakable characters, "Tekel—thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." They condemn every one that does not subscribe to their views, when the chances are two to one for life for those whom they condemn. Many seem to think that all that is necessary is a good theory, and it matters nothing about the practice. Therefore they will argue and contend with the mouth, but not with the life also.

Oh, reader, be a christian. Not only a believer in, but a follower of, Christ. Soon he is coming. Suppose he should come and find you away from your post, trying to defraud your neighbor—trying to carry some point, right or wrong—trying to keep some one on promises, in hopes of getting rid of paying honest debts, or something of the kind—where, oh, where, would you appear? What would be your plea before the Judge of all the earth? Would not your hopes, that are on conditions of unfeigned obedience, be counterfeit? The righteous will scarcely be saved; and if so, "where will the ungodly (professors and not possessors) and the sinner appear?" I see but two ways—the narrow and the broad. One in which Christ has led the way, and bid us follow him; and the other for all that do not follow him, no matter how good their theory may be. If there was a great deal more praying, and less fighting and quarreling about questions that gender strife, there would be much more religion in the world. Well might one exclaim, "Christians are scarce."

Oh, that men, professing the religion of Jesus, would be christians—that their daily walk might be such as will not bring reproach upon the cause of Christ. Remember, "by their fruits ye shall know them." Jesus will "reward every man according as his works shall be." He will punish them that "obey not the gospel." The church needs converting. Brn., be christians. Live so that sinners will have confidence in you, and you will see many of them converted, not only to theory, but also to practice. A. P. MOORE.

For the Crisis.

"Lo Here!"

My expose of Luke 17: 20–24 having appeared imperfectly, allow me to pen one paragraph more. Possibly I failed to give the points precisely; but it is not now material, save to get out the truth.

I. Mark! "Lo—Lo, and behold," v. 26, are but one and the same word—idou, which is an imperative form of the verb to see. In verse 23, it is the same word rendered "see here, or see there!"

II. "For," (gar) verse 11, is often used to mean "indeed, truly, moreover, besides." Hence it may be so read in this place. The Pharisees asked when the kingdom of God should come. Jesus said, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. Neither shall they say, Lo here! or Lo there! Lo INDEED, the kingdom of God is within you!" Then he told the truth in the premises. Amen.

III. The *un*authorized utterance, "Lo here," etc., is that of the false Christs, and erring creeds. Lo (they do say) Christ is to come (out West) among the Mormons, Shakers, Swedenborgians! Or in the most popular form they say, "Lo INDEED, (your scriptural faith is folly, because) the kingdom of God is within you!"

IV. This being the precise value of that language, it sets forth the contrast between the prevailing error among men, and the assertion of the Son of God. He says that his coming and kingdom will be open and evident, "as the lightning." It will be not in man, nor of man—"by observation;" but of God—like the deluge "in the days of Noah."

V. The rendering of this text, which expresses the original words fairly, and yet harmonizes it fully with "all scripture," must, I conceive, be both proper and truthful.

VI. Our Lord does use this language: "Lo here! or Lo there! Behold, indeed, the kingdom of God is within you!" But the context and general scope of scripture shows that it is forbidden. It is the language of unbelief and imposture.

VII. The justified, the most highly endowed, those whom the Lord honored as his apostles, and the first ministers of his grace, were taught to pray, "thy kingdom COME." To them, therefore, it was yet TO COME; and, of course, as we are not better than they, it is still future to us all.

VIII. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom"—1 Cor. 15: 49; therefore, if the kingdom is in his people, they are not in it. They "cannot enter into the kingdom of God" till they are raised from the dead, and made to "bear the image of the heavenly."—1 Cor. 15; John 3: 5–7.

From these and other Bible reasons, we do know, "by faith," that the kingdom of God is not in man, nor at all in those "Pharisees" who could not escape the damnation of hell!" J. B. C.

Beware of the Leaven of the Pharisees.

MR. EDITOR:—In reading the Boston Discussion I find, on page 7, in Dr. Litch's first speech, that he infers a conscious existence after death, from certain passages occurring in the Acts of the Apostles; and from the expression of Paul, made for the purpose of calling the attention of the audience, and gaining for himself a hearing viz., "I am a Pharisee." He (Dr. Litch) argues that the Pharisees believed in an intermediate state of the dead, or a conscious existence after death; and that, consequently, when Paul declared himself to be a Pharisee, he but announced himself to be firm in their belief. Suppose, then, for the argument's sake, we admit the point. Will that proposition agree with Paul's subsequent teaching, or the teaching of Christ? Taking it for granted, then, that Dr. Litch's assertion in regard to the belief of the Pharisees is correct, and also that Paul, by his expression, endorsed their belief, where will it lead us? Luke, the Evangelist to whom the Dr. refers, was one of the immediate followers of Christ—who sat at his feet, and drank in the words of wisdom as they fell from the lips of our Lord and Savior. It is presumable that, having received his instructions from the head of the church itself, he must of necessity be correct. Well, what instructions did he in common with the other Apostles receive? Turn to Matt. 16: 6, and we read—

"Then Jesus said unto them, take heed, and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees." The disciples wondered, and reasoned among themselves, not knowing what he meant. But Christ informs them in the 11th verse—"How is it that you do not understand, that I spake not to you concerning bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees."

Now it will be observed that he did not warn them against the Pharisees or Sadducees, but against the leaven (doctrine) of those sects. The Pharisees believed in the resurrection of the dead. It could not have been that against which our Savior warned them, for that he came to teach, and that is what he illustrated by his resurrection from the dead. What were the other doctrines of the Pharisees? Dr. Litch has fully illustrated them, we presume, for he seems satisfied with his elucidation, and we will not object:—A belief in the conscious existence after death, of the soul, in the form of man, and its ability to communicate with men in the flesh.

Now if we find Christ or his Apostles teaching these doctrines, we may reasonably conclude they are correct. If not, then we may as reasonably conclude they are the leaven (or doctrine) against which the disciples were warned. What did Christ teach? We find him teaching, "I am the resurrection and THE LIFE," and hence conclude he is the source of life, and if the source of life, then the only way through which life is attainable. If, then, a man has an interest in that sound, his life is assured him. And speaking of such an one Christ says, "I will (being the resurrection and the life,) raise him up (to life) at the last day." Then he has no life before, and if no life, no conscious existence, for that presupposes life. And hence we find Paul making use of the expression "I am a Pharisee,"—not in the sense in which the Dr. uses it, but thus,—

"I am a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." Not the conscious existence of the soul between death and the resurrection, but the resurrection itself. Paul was in a strait, but heeding the divine injunction, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves," he sought to create a division among his enemies. How could he do that and be a follower of Christ? Not by denying the resurrection by an appeal to the Sadducees, for the resurrection was the "gospel of glad tidings" to the Christians, and the Sadducees denied the resurrection. But by appealing to the Pharisees, who believed in the resurrection, he could accomplish his object of creating a division in his favor, without sacrificing his christian principles. That this is the manner in which it was used will fully appear to any one on reading the 23d chapter of Acts.

Should any farther evidence of Paul's belief and teaching be wished, it is abundantly set forth in the 15th of 1st Cor., commencing at the 12th verse. A. H. B.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 15.

MY DEAR SISTER:—Every degree of grace received must be confessed openly, in order to be retained. The light God gives to shine in our heart, must send forth its rays abroad, in order to illuminate others.

Look upon the moon, in her goings forth, and learn a lesson of wisdom! As earth recedes, and ceases to intervene between her and the sun, how increasingly does she shine forth in beauty, and scatter her pure though borrowed light to illumine that very earth which once intercepted the light, and casts its own dark shadow upon her! When her whole body is filled with light, with what queenly beauty does she ride through the heavens, surrounded with the lesser luminaries; and how man rejoices in her brightness! By and by, we see her light decreasing. Earth casts anew its shadow, and in proportion as that shadow increases the light of the moon declines, until her whole body is filled with darkness! So much for the figure, now for the thing illustrated.

The young convert may be shadowed forth by the new moon, small in his beginnings, casting forth but a faint circle of light. As the heart becomes more fully separated from earthly attractions—more perfectly purified from selfish propensities—more entirely turned toward the Sun of righteousness—there is an increase of light until, as the moon in her meridian glory, he exhibits to the world the character of a mature christian; there is nothing that intervenes between himself and God, the fountain of light; so that his "whole body is full of light, having no part dark," and thus he becomes "the light of the world." But he shines only by reflection!

Too often is it the case, that those who were "once illuminated," have allowed the world again to occupy a place in their hearts, the light waxes dim, the [illegible] increases, and all, at length, becomes darkness. As the moon retains not in herself the light received from the sun, but diffuses it abroad to cheer and bless the hearts of men; so, my sister, be faithful to impart unto others the light God gives thee, and thus will He be honored, souls be blest, and thou increase yet more in every good thing.

But will it not be boasting to speak of high attainments, of "perfect love," of "sanctification of the spirit?" Can the moon boast of her brightness, when shining with borrowed rays? "Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? As if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood." Is it boasting for the one who, by the skill of a physician, has been restored to health, from a long and painful sickness, to extol the wisdom and power of that physician in making them "every whit whole?" If it be not boasting thus to do, no more will it be so, to tell of what Christ hath done for our souls! It is not boasting to speak of the light God gives—the salvation his grace imparts; nor is it humility to be ever speaking of our wicked hearts, our sinful thoughts, our darkness and bondage. For what purpose do we have a Savior, if not to save us from these? Has he not power, not only to forgive sins, but also to cleanse the heart "from all unrighteousness?" And if he does thus save us, is it not our duty to acknowledge it? What though some scoff and say, "There goes one of the holy ones!" What though some say, as did an old gray headed Baptist minister to one who professed to be redeemed from all iniquity, "I am afraid of you?" He had put the question directly to her, (knowing her to be an advocate of holiness,) "Are you saved from sin?" and she replied, "Yes, I am, by the grace of God." He turned from her, and actually ran out of the room, exclaiming, "I am afraid of you! I am afraid of you!"

Had the sister boasted of native goodness—had she advocated the doctrine that she had made her own heart pure, then he might have had some ground for his fears; but, as she taught nothing but gospel purity; as she advanced no sentiment at variance with the revelation that Christ is able to save to the uttermost all who come unto the Father by him; that his blood "cleanseth from all unrighteousness;" that he died in order to redeem his people from all iniquity," he need not have thus [illegible] at the idea advanced, or the profession made.

Confession of the grace received, is the first cross to be taken, after believing in the full salvation. Yours in love, [illegible]

For the Crisis.

Excitement in Rome.

It is not of Rome in Italy, but in Maine, I am about to write. Something more than a year ago, Bro. H. B. Sevey visited Rome, and commenced meetings in a school-house. Religious interest was very low, and had been for some years. It was soon manifest that the Lord had a servant at work there; the people gathered; the place would not hold them, and they moved the meetings to the Town House, which soon became too strait to hold the people. Many backsliders were reclaimed, and sinners were converted during the winter. God worked a great work among them, to the joy and salvation of some, and the sorrow and dismay of his enemies. Bro. S. has visited them and preached occasionally to them since. I also have preached there a few times. The truth has been making a good impression; but some have felt troubled, and lately sent for help to put down "Millerism," as they call the doctrine we preach.

A few weeks ago, I was in the vicinity—[illegible] and intending to hold a meeting there with the brethren on Sunday; but was told that Eld. A. Dearing, of Waterville, had been engaged by somebody to preach in Rome Town House, against the doctrine of the sleep of the dead and destruction of the wicked. I therefore concluded to attend and learn what I could. I also advised the brethren to attend, and a good number of them did so. The throng was great, the interest intense. The Elder gave me a seat at his right side, which I was only glad to occupy because seats were scarce; but afterwards felt that it would be better to stand out in the centre of the house than to "sit in the seat of the scornful." His text was a part of the 24th verse of Mark 12,—"Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures?" The introduction was on this wise, as nearly as I can quote him:

"The Savior used this language to the Sadducees in a discourse spoken to teach them the doctrine of consciousness in death. . . The ancient Sadducees did not believe a conscious existence after death. There is a class of modern Sadducees who do not believe in conscious existence after death; they differ from the ancient class by believing in a resurrection. My discourse to-day will be to prove that they are in error. . . . First, I wish it understood that the Bible was written in language suited to the common people, in their language. It was not written in the style of men of learning, nor did it bear the application of philosophy and science."

He then cited the account of the sun and moon standing still. Here we were told that our Bible was not a philosophic or scientific book. He then quoted many texts we use to show that the dead sleep, and frequently stated that "the people," "we and every body," talked just so about our dead friends, but we did not mean so. [illegible] only used such phrases because the people did. He did not mean they were dead, etc. He then gave, in a perverted form, our use and application of several texts; argued that "Christ's soul was not left in hell (hades) because it never went there;" quoted Acts 2: 34.—"For David is not ascended into the heavens," and told us this meant that David had not ascended to heaven when he wrote the remark in the 16th Psalm about Christ's soul not being left in hell; but there was no evidence that David was not in heaven when Peter preached. We had lots of this sort, and from one of the so-called greatest, and most learned of the ministers of the Free-will Baptist denomination.

P. M. He spoke from the same text, he said, and directed his efforts to show that the wicked would live forever. He granted, they had not immortality, and that we modern Sadducees argued it must be sought; then quoted 1 Tim. 6: 16, dwelling on the phrase—"which no man can approach unto," to prove that we could not obtain that immortality by seeking it. He next quoted Rom. 2: 7, and argued that "it did not promise immortality, but eternal life." Then quoted to prove that the righteous have eternal life here, now, and that Paul asserted that eternal life should be the reward of seeking it, and have it now, when we believe. Had he quoted the 16th verse, it would have refuted all his efforts. We were then told that fire did not mean fire; God never meant us to understand that the wicked should be burned in fire—that the second death was not death—that it was the lake of fire; and then he quoted several texts on fire, eternal fire, etc., to show us that it was fire "unquenchable." The learned man next told us that if fire consumed all that was consumable and then went out, it was quenched. This is a new idea, and if true, the dictionaries should be revised at once. Finally, the audience were called to "examine the competency of the leading teachers of this sleepy, no soul doctrine." He said they had "been sometime engaged in preaching on prophecy, and made great mistakes in 1843 and '52, (probably meaning '54) and several other times, and they are as likely to be in error in this." He next referred to me, and endorsed me as honest, pious, and well meaning, but said I was as liable to be mistaken in this as I had been about time preaching, etc. Thus he closed, after giving caution not to read the books we circulated. I asked to speak, but was forbidden. I then told the speaker I had been misrepresented, and he must correct it or I should. He asked wherein I told him I had never preached time? He then turned to the audience and made a correction in my case, and dismissed the people. I then told him he had greatly misrepresented the leading teachers of this doctrine. They never preached time, with one or two exceptions, and most of them were never connected with the Advent movement. Thus we parted. He had probably never seen the works of Messrs. Dobney, Moncrieff, Ellis, Blain, Foster, Campbell, Thomas, Hastings, Hudson, and others, who have never been connected with time failures. He had evidently seen something from John Milton, for he remarked that our ideas could "be traced back as far as old Milton." I believe it is well that he has spent a day in Rome; truth will shine the clearer to those who are seeking it, and, as it is a protestant town, people will think for themselves. I. C. WELLCOME.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 16, 1859.

QUOTING SCRIPTURE.—We wish to say again to those who write for the Crisis, when you quote Scripture, give it precisely as it is in the Bible. In order to do this, it is necessary to turn to the passage before writing it. When our correspondents attend to this requirement, it saves us much labor. Do not fail to observe this rule.

"Why Not Seen Before?"

We are often asked, when showing that the Bible teaches the destruction of the wicked, why this truth was not seen before? We cannot tell, but we feel very thankful that it is now seen, and that all the combined efforts of the opposing powers cannot stop its onward march. Truly, this is an "Age of gospel light," and also of fables and darkness.

We might ask, why did not Christ come sooner? why did we not have the reformation begin before Luther's time? We know the events have transpired, and we know, too, that light is shining upon the Bible, and that passages once obscure and seemingly absurd, are now plain and consistent. For this we thank the Lord.

We would like to inquire of those who ask us the question, why did not we see before we did, that our venerable fathers in the gospel were wrong, when they taught us that there were "infants in hell not a span long," and that "God made some men on purpose to show his power in their eternal torments in hell-fire," and "decreed all their sins which led to the result," and sent "the gospel to some people, on purpose to increase their damnation?" Why were not these abominable doctrines repudiated sooner? We do not presume to tell; but thank the Lord that they are seldom preached now. In answer to our heading, we would say, the apostles and all Bible writers uniformly taught the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked. Hence, instead of asking, "why not seen before," we should ask how came people to see anything else? It arose from the double and mystical interpretation introduced by Origen in the second century, imitated and perpetuated by the Roman Catholic church, and handed down to us by the Protestant churches. We know many seem to think that it is almost incredible to suppose that the Protestant church holds erroneous doctrines; but when we examine them in the light of Scripture, and weigh them in the scales of truth, like Belshazzar, they are "found wanting." We are glad that many can now see the difference between assertion and proof, creeds and the Bible We think there is a reformation now in progress but little inferior to that in Luther's time. We do not stand alone in this view, but meet a hearty response from those who are better prepared to judge than ourselves. The theology of the day seems to be wrong in almost every point, and needs a complete overhauling, rearranging, revising and correcting, to make it harmonize with the standard of truth. In short, it is so unsound, and rotten with traditions and fables, we think it had better be buried in the bottomless pit, with the beast that goes to perdition, and the Bible substituted in its place. Men have been duped long enough with perverted Scripture, and some begin to realize it, and have concluded that they have a right to think for themselves, read their own Bible, and believe the Lord means what he says. They are satisfied that the truth needs no twisting and turning to make it harmonize with itself, but that it requires much to make it coincide with the confused, mystical theology of the day. On account of the strange and contradictory systems advanced by popular teachers, the Bible has become to all as "a book that is sealed." Isa. 29: 11.

O Lord, hasten the time when the simple harmony of thy word shall be seen by all thy children, and declared to a world perishing "for lack of knowledge." Arouse the lovers of thy word to scatter the light and truth in all directions with an unconquerable zeal.

Prayer Meetings.

Never be absent from the prayer meetings, when you can possibly be present. From over sixteen years observation, we are fully convinced that those who attend the prayer meetings, and when there take an active part, are the ones who have the richest joy in this life and the brightest hope of immortality in the kingdom of God. The prayer meeting is the church thermometer. When they are living poorly, their prayers and exhortations are usually long, dry, and very tedious. When the children of the Lord are awake in the cause of Christ, prayers and exhortations are short and fervent. If we would have a good prayer meeting, we should go to our closet for private devotion, before we enter the prayer room. Many rush into meeting with the utmost carelessness, without meditation, self-examination or prayer, more than the most thoughtless worldling, and hardly get their minds composed, and in a state for worship till the time arrives to close the meeting. The result is, the time passes heavily, and but few enjoy the meeting. There is nothing to attract or interest the unconverted, consequently they do not come. Soon the prayer meeting, which should be a place of delight to all the disciples of Christ, becomes a place of dread, where professors drag out an unpleasant hour. This is having a name to live, and being dead—a luke-warm state—more disagreeable to the Lord than to one another.

There are four things that should ever be avoided if we would have good prayer meetings.

1. Long prayers. When alone, we can pray as long as we please, but all the public prayers of the Bible are exceedingly short, usually from half a minute to two minutes. The longest, Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, is only about five minutes in length. It often happens that people pray for almost every thing and expect nothing. They would be frightened if their prayers were answered. Some have an introduction twice as long as a whole prayer should ever be for a public meeting. It seems as though some thought they must make a long prayer, so as to make others think that they have considerable ability. As the Savior says of the Pharisees, they, "for a pretence make long prayers." To have prayer acceptable, we should desire something, ask for it in simplicity, and believe we have it, for if we ask wavering, we must not expect to "receive anything of the Lord." Jas. 1: 6–7.

2. Long exhortations. If we would have interesting social meetings, we must avoid long exhortations. There are three objections to these. First, they keep back the weak ones, because they know they can not say but a few words, and hence they dare not try after one of these long harangues. Second, the long talker uses up the time that belongs to others, so that they cannot speak if they would. They are like persons in a room where there are but few chairs, who keep all the rest standing the whole time, and sit themselves till they are actually tired; while at the same time all the others are exceedingly tired of standing, besides being out of patience with those who have engrossed all the seats. Again, they are like persons invited to a feast, who take their position around the table and eat till they are satiated before they make room for any others to come. We are sometimes in social meetings where some of these greedy ones will occupy ten or fifteen minutes, thus robbing a dozen others of their time, besides trying the patience of the whole company. People have a strange idea about talking to edification. Some of the most edifying exhortations we have ever heard were not over half a minute in length; while others that were deeply so, consisted in sobs and tears, with handkerchief to the eyes, without a spoken word. But very few can talk five minutes at a time in a social meeting, and be edifying. No danger of having the prayers and exhortations too short.—Third, when persons talk long in the prayer meeting, they are inclined to argue some disputed point of doctrine, and as certainly as they do this, they will throw a chilling influence upon the meeting, especially if those holding the opposite views are present. We have seen a great many meetings spoiled in this way, but have never known one benefited by such.

3. Long pauses. If you would have good prayer meetings, avoid long pauses between prayers and exhortations. There is no place where unimproved time passes so heavily and disagreeably as in a conference meeting. We prefer the long talk to the long pause. Improve every moment till you close the meeting. Do not try to drag through just so long, but close when you get through, if you only continue but one half hour. Engage in the work heartily when you are together, and you will soon find the interest increasing, and your numbers multiplying. No one loves to go to a dull prayer meeting. People love earnestness.

4. Avoid debates. Above all things, avoid controversy in prayer meetings. Better have none, than to meet for the worship of God, and spend the time disputing one another. Wherever this has been practiced the effect has been most disastrous. No church can live and grow where it is practiced. We have known some of the most prosperous churches entirely ruined in this way. If a brother says something in the meeting which you think is not correct, never get up and oppose him, but wait till you can see him alone, and then have a pleasant talk about the matter. If something is said out of the way, instead of combatting it in the meeting, sing some sweet song of Zion, pray, or talk on some subject as far removed from it as possible, and thus turn the mind off from the subject. By so doing, you get rid of the matter in a few moments, whereas if we begin to open our batteries upon it, all minds are fastened on that subject, the prayer meeting is turned into a debating club, and the spirit of worship and devotion dies out at once. The Lord's ways are equal, and we have never known any exceptions to these positions. Let us be wise, and profit by past experience.

Poultney.

The great work is still onward in this place, notwithstanding a combined effort to make the meetings as unpopular as possible, by means of misrepresentation and the busy use of the tongue of slander. Yet He that is for us is more than all that can be against us. We can say, as did Wesley in his last moments, "But the best of all is, God is with us." This is truly the work of the Lord, and the fruits are blessed. Families once miserable in sin are now rejoicing in the love of Christ. They, who, a few weeks since were shockingly profane and wicked, may now be seen morning and evening bowed around the family altar in the midst of happy and loved ones. He, that was a bold infidel, now presses the Bible to his bosom with delight, praising the Lord for the light of his truth. Family quarrels are hushed in the sweet peace of the gospel. The heart once selfish and covetous, now beats with warm christian benevolence towards all mankind. He, who walked the streets with haughty scorn upon the poor man, now takes him by the hand and calls him brother. Men, who have grown gray in sin, have at last submitted to the mild spirit of Jesus, and are truly new creatures. It is seldom we see a larger number together whose countenances are illumined with the christian's joy, than assemble at our love feasts. Last Lord's day morning, March 6th, one hundred and seven witnesses testified in favor of the christian religion, and several of them spoke twice. It was truly a heavenly place in Christ Jesus. Yet one of the ministers in Poultney remarked that he should rather go to a ball than to attend the meetings at the Stone Church, the place where we worship, and would advise the people to go to a dance in preference to those meetings. This remark will give the reader an idea of the spirit which many professors of religion manifest towards this revival from the Lord. If the opposing efforts of some had been directed in harmony with the Spirit of God, doubtless many more would now be enjoying the christian's hope. It saddens our heart to see the professed disciples of Christ opposing his own work. "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Like Paul, when persecuting the saints, they seem to be "exceedingly mad;" but like him, we hope soon will obtain "mercy" because they do it "ignorantly." Some who started to seek and serve the Lord, have been turned away from the path of life by the frowns and opposition of the professed friends of Jesus. It should be remembered, Jesus says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." It seems as though the sect of the Pharisees was in existence now. Who can say it is not? In almost every place we labor there is a class who act just like them, and are the greatest obstacles in the way of revivals with which we meet. Jesus might say to them as to the ancient Pharisees, "Ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in."

Although the enemies of the Lord rise up against us, and throw stumbling blocks in the way of some, new ones are continually coming to the Savior of the world and obtaining pardon. Seven were baptized last Lord's day, March 6th, and received the promised gift of the Holy Spirit. Several others have resolved to embrace the next opportunity to obey the Lord in this ordinance. Sixty-seven have now been buried with Christ in baptism.

In the evening, seventy-nine happy ones sat down to the table of the Lord, to commemorate his death and sufferings. It was a solemn, interesting and profitable season. Several requested prayers. Eighty-one have signed the following covenant:—

CHRISTIAN COVENANT.

"We whose names are subjoined, do hereby covenant and agree, by the help of the Lord, to walk together as a church of Christ; faithfully maintaining its ordinances, taking the Bible as our only rule of faith and practice, church order and discipline; making christian character the only test of fellowship and communion.

We further agree, with christian fidelity and meekness, to exercise mutual watch-care, to counsel, admonish or reprove, as duty may require, and to receive the same from each other as becometh the household of faith."

Brn. Justus L. Knapp and Asa S. Rogers, have been appointed Elders.

We learn that the union efforts of Baptists and Congregationalists in East Poultney have been much blessed, and that a goodly number have been converted. Let us all praise the Lord for what he is doing.

☞ Those to whom we send BILLS this week, have only paid to No. 156; and as our terms are "payable in advance," those who receive them will perceive that $1.00 more than the amount on the bills is due upon the current volume. We should be sorry to press any of our friends who are unable to pay; yet our increased expenses are such as imperatively to call upon all who have the means for prompt remittance.

"Prepare War."—JOEL 3: 9.

When we hear people speak about the conversion of the world, endeavoring to show that it is growing better, and that national difficulties will be settled by peaceful arbitrations, it looks to us like a blind man pointing the way to lost travelers. We can hardly help saying, O "ye blind guides," how long before ye will cease to "pervert the righteousness of the Lord?" "Distress of nations with perplexity" must characterize the last days, just before we "see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." The coming of Christ, we think, can not be far away. Every one, who expects to be ready to meet Christ, should be upon his watch tower, with his lamp trimmed and burning, like those who "wait for their Lord."

The war cloud hanging over Europe is rapidly increasing in size, and begins to assume a most threatening aspect. Says the Paris correspondent of the New York Herald:—"All securities remain depressed. Trade is in a perfect stagnation. The military speak of war as certain." The London Herald's correspondent says that a camp of one hundred thousand men is to be formed at Toulon by the end of March.

"THE DANUBIAN QUESTION.—The News says the cloud in the south of Europe is dark and threatening, but the clouds in the East are big with tempests, and unless Austria, who sends her caveat against discussion of Italian wrongs, be persuaded to hold her peace on Roumain rights, it is not improbable that the solution of the Italian question may be transferred from Rome to Milan, to Jassy or Bucharest."

LA PRESSE ON THE WAR QUESTION.

[Translated for the New York Herald.]

PARIS, Feb 14, 1859.

• • • • Nothing can, therefore, be accomplished in the Roman States so long as Austria rules there, and the first condition of any reform in Central Italy (there are no two words to express it) is to put out Austria.

In order not to continue to expend our money as a pure loss, whilst Austria spends that of the Holy State, in order not to become ridiculous, we are forced to evacuate Rome as early as possible; and as we cannot do this in the present state of things without delivering the Pope to the chances of a terrible revolution, it is clear that our government ought to employ every means for assuring the peace and happiness of that unfortunate State, and consequently to put outside Austria, which is the only obstacle to the peace of the country.

[From La Presse, Feb. 15.]

• • • Who has rivetted the Pope to his odious system, that is, the destruction of the Romans? Austria. Who instigates the King of Naples to his foolish resistance to the most legitimate wishes, and to unamable persecutions? Austria. Who crushes under iron bondage Lombardy and Venice? Austria. Who enslaves Modena and Tuscany? Austria. Yes, Austria everywhere. Austria, therefore, expelled, the position of affairs is changed, and order is established.

But does Italy count exclusively upon herself to throw off the yoke of her oppressor? No. The time has passed when, in the frenzy of her patriotism, she pronounced those bold words, Italia fara da se! On the contrary, she invokes the co-operation of generous nations. Is not her cause that of justice and civilization? It is also ours. We do not fear intervention. Why? Ought we not rather to welcome with gratitude the opportunity of putting a termination to the anxiety which torments Europe? As we have already said, Austria does not only raise her head in Italy, but also elsewhere. Is it not Austria that has nullified the results of the treaty of Paris? Is it not Austria that inspires Turkey with her treason and treachery? Is it not Austria that troubled the alliance that united us with England? Would not a war which would deliver us from this nightmare be blessed above all other wars? Such is the war, we believe, preparing in Italy, and why we regard it with confidence and security.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times, writing on the 15th of Feb., says:—

"Three or four days ago, information was received from France which removed all doubt as to the intention of the Emperor Napoleon; and it would not be surprising suddenly to learn that the Austrian army is to be placed on a war footing. The military organization is so excellent that 650,000 men can be fully prepared for action within a month or six weeks."

The same authority says it is evident that a mighty storm is brewing, and that the aim of Russia and France is to reduce Austria to the same level as Turkey.

Says the New York Herald:—

"The political relations of Europe have arrived at a stage of complication from which it is difficult to foresee a peaceable issue. It is not that the immediate causes of misunderstanding are impossible of adjustment, but because there are weightier interests in the background which admit of no milder arbitration than the sword. . . . We know that vast military preparations are being made in France, Austria and Sardinia; that all efforts to arrange the causes of misunderstanding that have led to them, have as yet proved ineffectual; and that neither Great Britain nor Russia, the only powers that can impose a check on the designs of France, are disposed to interfere. Matters have, in fact, arrived at the same critical point which, just previous to the Crimean war, held the whole world in suspense. There is this difference, however, in the aspect of the two questions—that whereas at that time the Emperor Nicholas might have retreated with honor from a position which was one of unprovoked aggression, the Emperor Francis Joseph cannot yield a point of the demands sought to be enforced against him by Sardinia and France, without abdicating the rights confirmed to him by the Congress of Vienna, and by special treaties growing out of that Congress. If, therefore, the political and family alliance between France and Piedmont, and the energetic declarations of Count Cavour at the opening of the Sardinian Chambers mean any thing, nothing can avert from the Continent the perils of a war which may change the whole face of its political institutions."

A Worthy Example.

In Winsted, a romantic village among the hills of Connecticut, where we formerly resided, is a Congregational minister, by the name of C. H. A. Bulkley, who has taken a noble position, whose example we hope others will soon follow. In his anniversary sermon, preached Dec. 5th, 1858, he says:—

In September, '57, brother Saxton, (Methodist) came to my office, telling me how he foresaw the presence of God at their Methodist Camp Meeting, and advised me to follow where God led. I shrugged my shoulders and called it a spasm. As Abraham bade Lot go his way, so did I to him. God forgive me for my sectarianism, my bigotry, my blindness which could not perceive, as did Peter in his vision, the rich blessings then descending from the opened heaven. I went, I saw young men, those who had been notorious in the ways of sin, kneeling. Should I fold my arms and walk away? No! I at once laid my bigotry and denominational feelings, and fastidiousness, in one black bundle at God's feet, and went in. You were not ready to follow as I had hoped, as I had expected, as I supplicated. But only a few went with me. Was I wise in going, or were you in withholding? Was there a nobler zeal and a holier spirit in you who looked indifferently on, or did those who went forth to toil in the vineyard return with a richer spiritual harvest? Ah, doubt not that had we all in the singleness of zeal and the oneness of christian love joined heart and soul on that occasion, God would have been even more powerfully with us. See how, in Collinsville, as I related on Thursday, Adventists and Congregationalists laid aside their bickerings of creed and ritual, and united to receive the glorious outpouring of the Spirit. As the result, two hundred souls were raised from the bondage of sin to the blessed freedom of a holy life, and the hope and promise of an immortality with God. Suppose the case reversed, and you had come and begged me to co-operate with you and the church? Would you not have reproached, and despised, and condemned me? One convert declared to me he could not unite with a church so cold. Afterwards there was a partial improvement, when mortal powers could no longer resist the multiplying evidences of that work of grace. I shall never regret my course on that occasion, but thank God I did as I did, and that he has abundantly rewarded and blessed me. And one evening God so filled my soul that I asked him to stay his hand lest I should die—afterwards he withdrew, and I was walled in as with drifts and icebergs. Denominational feelings and sectarian pride grew within me. Then I resigned myself into God's hand more fully than I had done before, and then came that memorable night when the great truths of eternity passed before me, and the contemplation of God and Judgment so deluged my soul. Positively, in my view, it was the work of God, —and the discourse recently preached by me, which has given so much satisfaction, was the result of that night's rushing emotions, when I felt in my own person such a deep measure of the sorrows of Christ in Gethsemane.—I weep that you do not acknowledge the works of God with your pastor. I was made strong with a glorious strength during that hour, and when I stood before you next morning, seeing your defects and mine, I was aroused. Ah, if you had seen eternity and sin as I did, you would not have been concerned about the manner of your preacher, and wagged your heads on him and called him crazed. Whatever you thought of that Sabbath's work, it was the earthquake's shock and the lightning's stroke breaking the ice about my heart. . . . . When I came among you I was ambitious, flippant and sarcastic, studying speech more than duty, and popularity more than the salvation of souls. Now I have trodden pride under foot, have sacrificed my earthly longings, and surrendered myself more to God. . . . . If you listen to and repeat idle slanders—if at every utterance of truth you become nervous and touchy—if you complain when my views are not smoothed off and rounded to agree with yours, how can you expect God's blessing? A few months ago you were fervent—now you are moody, cold and silent. Why is it? Are you vitalized and sanctified by a purer inspiration? May it not be you are more concerned about orthodoxy than piety—may you not be more anxious for peace and the thrift of your church than for spiritual peace? . . . You were suited with me when I went lecturing, and were you not a little vain and proud when I carried the name and fame of the pastor of your church abroad? . . . . In the past year I have given you more truth than in the previous four. Alas! I have been too plain for cultivated taste—too practical for your finer sensibilities, which seek the ravishing enchantments of musical and flowing speech, rather than the directness and simplicity of truth. There is such a thing as eyes that see not, and ears which hear not. Do not ask for milk and water as before. Not for ten thousand worlds will I go back to such sermons. When I can walk in God's glorious sunlight, I will not kindle pine knots and tallow candles. The finely wrought sermons of city pulpits have not truth enough. This is the trouble—you desire more stylish and showy discourses; you are looking to see what breath of popularity blows. Strong preaching, you say, will do for revivals, but now you desire peace and quiet. The devil, if at all, must be slightly tickled now; he must not be waked up and made to howl and roar. I confess the most encouraging sign I see is that truth stirs up the reeking mire and stagnation of your hearts. Truth must go into the evil of men's hearts like a plow in its furrow, upturning the creeping worms and noisome reptiles, that spiritual plants may take root. . . . . I will not bend to the dogmas of the ancients, nor screw my mouth to utter the shibboleth of modern theological schools. I will, I must, be free to speak Christ as he reveals himself to me; and you, in that equal service of God, which is "perfect freedom," must permit me. . . . I am Christ's freeman, not your representative:—not your bondsman, but the preacher of his truth. You are free to receive or reject my preaching; but if I depart from the teachings and spirit of the Bible, then you may cast me from this place. I have desired to see here a church of true freedom—without dogmatic harness, and free from theological whipping-posts,—a church of true, noble, living sons of God, never deluded by sorceries, and divinations, and enchantments, and it had been my yearning prayer that I might lead it upwards through beautiful and holy ways, to a life by the waters of love and the rivers of peace.

☞ Keep it before the people, that "FABLES OF INFIDELITY AND FACTS OF FAITH" is the best book on the subject that can be found in the market. His article, "Did the World make itself?" explodes the heathenish theories of modern infidels with a master hand. "Infidelity among the Stars" is a splendid chapter. "Telescopic views of Scripture" finishes off, as the Bible does with "The New Heavens and the New Earth;" and "Science, or Faith," a most excellent chapter, closes the volume. The old cavils of infidelity and atheism, with their foolish theories, are cut into shoe-strings finer than hair. I don't know but some are really annihilated. Here are just the facts you want to stop the mouth of infidelity, and this book saves you the trouble of hunting all over creation for them. Send 75 cents, and get the volume by mail, or $6 for a dozen. For sale at this office and by H. L. Hastings. H.

ENCOURAGING.—We are thankful for the efforts of the friends of our family paper. In two days we have received fifty new subscribers. PAULINE THEOLOGY: or, The Christian Doctrine of Future Punishment as taught by the Apostle Paul. By H. L. Hastings. TENTH THOUSAND.

We are glad to be again supplied with this little treatise, which we, years ago, characterised as the best pamphlet on this subject for general circulation. The little thing has made its own way without much assistance, and the significant "tenth thousand" shows that it has made quite an extensive acquaintance. It has been read on both sides of the Atlantic, and many, including some ministers and theological students, have been convinced, by the reading of it, that Paul taught that "the wages of sin is death." It has never been answered, except by a sneer! Those who would like to learn the teaching of the great apostle of the Gentiles concerning this subject, will find it here in all that fullness that became one who "kept back nothing that was profitable," and did not shun to declare "all the counsel of God." Let this tenth thousand be rapidly circulated. Price 15 cents single. Postage 1 cent. $10 per 100. Those who wish to obtain it in book form for preservation, will find it, with "The Old Paths" and other tracts, neatly bound up in the volume just issued by the author, entitled, "Tracts on Immortality," 220 pp. Price, postage paid, 60 cents. For sale at this office, or by H. L. Hastings, Rochester, N. Y.

Debt and Grace.

From The Freeman, (London, Eng.,) a paper of wide circulation in the Baptist body.

"The Rev. C. F. Hudson on a Future Life."

To the Editors:

GENTLEMEN,—May I be permitted to make known to your theological readers, through the somewhat unusual channel of your columns of correspondence, the recent publication of a work in America, which is not likely otherwise to become soon known to them either by advertisement or review? I refer to a book by Rev. C. F. Hudson, entitled, "Debt and Grace, as related to the Doctrine of a Future Life," published at a moderate price by Jewett & Co., Boston. That which leads me to think that this special mention may be pardoned is, that this work, whatever may be thought of its argument, is, in point of execution and solid weight of exact learning, confessedly one of the very first productions of the American theological press of late years. It is worthy to be mentioned along with the works of Dr. Pye Smith, or Dr. McCosh, each of these names being taken to represent their peculiar excellencies of learning and metaphysical power. The reach of thought, the exact erudition, the vigor of style, and the moderation of tone, must command the attention of the greatest.

When I say that the object of this book is to institute a review of the controversy on the Future State, and on the Scripture doctrine of "Life in Christ," which was carried on a few years ago, and in which Dr. Hamilton and Mr. Hinton took part in this country,—and that Mr. Hudson gives the weight of his most learned and able judgment to the side which was taken by some of us against them,—your readers will understand why I am anxious that at least this new book should be known wherever Dr. Hamilton's "Lectures" and Mr. Hinton's "Athanasia" have gone forth as authorities.

Perhaps I may just add that a recent addition to the literature of this solemn question was made by a veteran scholar on this side of the water, in an "Essay on the Duration of Evil," published by Simpkin. Mr. Hudson's book may be ordered through Sampson Low, or through Trubner.

I trust that the peculiar circumstances may seem to excuse this intrusion on your columns, especially since it is certain that all your readers who are competent to judge would assent to the literary character which I have given of Mr. Hudson's production. It has been received in America with the profound respect of all parties.

I am, gentlemen, yours faithfully,

EDWARD WHITE.

"Acts 13: 48."

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—Not having seen any exposition of the above passage as requested by our brother, I respectfully submit the following:—

"As many as were ordained to eternal life, believed." As sacred scripture is its own best interpreter, I compare this passage with Rom. 9: 15, where we read the word of the Lord to Moses, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy." Also with Eph. 1: 11; "In whom (Christ) also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will;" with Eph 1: 4–5; Rev 17: 8; James 1: 18; John 1: 13; Rom. 8; 28–30; John 17: 2. These, and other similar passages, teach us that the disposition to believe the gospel with the heart unto righteousness and salvation, is attributed by the Spirit of truth, not to our own superior virtue, but to the gracious purpose of God. Coming to Christ and believing in him are synonymous terms. Jesus affirms, "No man can come unto me. except it were given unto him of my Father. —John 6: 65. Our Savior, however, teaches us, also, that this inability is in our own unwillingness, and not in any deficiency of natural power in us, or of evidence concerning the truth of the gospel. "Ye WILL NOT come unto me that ye might have life."—John 5: 40. The cause of this unwillingness, he represents to be the love of the present world which is the sinner's guilt.—John 5: 44.

This foreordination to eternal life, which Acts 13: 48 and numerous other passages teach us, is the cause why some believe the gospel rather than others, is supposed by some of our dear brethren, to be incompatible with the invitation to all sinners to "come and take of the water of life freely." This arises from confounding things which are distinct. The adequacy of the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God, "for the sins of the whole world," 1 John 2: 2; and the perfect sincerity of the divine invitation to all men, whoever will, to come and freely partake of its eternal and inestimable benefits, are plainly revealed truths. No man should doubt a moment concerning them. But the divine purpose to offer salvation to all who are willing to accept of it, and the divine purpose to dispose some to accept, when all with one consent make excuse, Luke 14: 18, are two distinct purposes, perfectly consistent wich each other.

All men having, by transgression, become guilty before God, (Rom 3: 19) and justly exposed to everlasting death, (Rom 6: 23;) both these purposes are purposes of grace, or unmerited favor. Without the latter purpose, no man would be saved, for no man can enter the kingdom of God except he is born of the Spirit of God—John 3: 3–5—which we know all men are not. This is the work of God, "according to his purpose."—Rom 8: 28. "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth."—James 1: 18. We are "born not of the will of man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God."—John 1: 13. "You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins."—Eph 2: 1. "Not unto us, not unto us, but to thy name, O Lord, be the glory." Respectfully submitted.

The Christian Mother Bereft.

O, death has been an enemy,
Through all the night of sin;
Under its reign, by faith we long
To see life's day begin.

We feel it is an enemy
To us, we feel it now;
As 'neath this unexpected stroke
Submissively we bow.

We felt it as we stood around
That loved one's open grave;
And knew that means could not avail,
From death's strong grasp to save.

We miss him in his little bed,
And as we meet in prayer;
We miss him round the festal board,
And in his empty chair.

But yet there is a blessed hope,
That looks beyond the grave;
Oh death, where is thy victory?
There is a power to save.

Jesus once lay a prisoner,
But he arose on high,
And captive led captivity,
Deliverance to bring nigh.

The winter reign of death must pass,
We wait the promised hour;
One loved one in that spring-time blooms,
A bright, unfading flower.

Correspondence.

From Eld. J. Blain.

BRO. GRANT, and Brn. in Boston, or to whom it may concern in the East:—I write to introduce to you Bro. Moncrieff, or to state some facts about him, and his wishes, etc. I requested him to visit me from London, C. W., one hundred miles from here, on learning he felt it his duty to preach again, after lecturing on temperance, phrenology and science, for four years, by which he has obtained a good living. He came here last week, and spent five days; preached for the Advent Brn. on Lord's day, as we wished to learn his talents as a speaker—as a writer we know him. He is a good and warm speaker, and powerful reasoner, used no notes, and gave one of the best sermons I ever heard. It was on God as love. After exhibiting the character of God and the plan of salvation, he gave, in brief, the hardest blow to endless torment I ever witnessed, so far as reasoning is concerned. Brn. were all deeply interested, and regretted much that they could not retain him here, for want of means, as all are poor.

The main object of his visit was to learn the state of things in the United States, as to support and usefulness, should he come among us. He wishes to leave C. W. and devote his time to preaching somewhere, having no place in view. Bro. Storrs has invited him to visit New York and Philadelphia, but could give no encouragement of support, or settlement that way.

I gave him a view of affairs East, and was decided that Boston, or the region around, or Eastern States, was the field for him, and he could be supported there. He is well versed in the languages, having spent ten years to prepare for the ministry in the dissenting, or Congregational Church; was immersed by Bro. Dobney. He has attended to the prophecies, and is with us in the belief of the soon and personal coming of Christ. He is pleasant and sociable in his manners—not aristocratic, large and portly in his appearance,—41 years of age.

He is in the following embarrassment as to temporal affairs. He has built a house, costing $1600—paid all but $400, which is due in instalments of $16 per month. It will not sell at present, but would rent, most likely. His wife and her sister, a learned lady, keep a select school or seminary. He has but one child, a son of 17, whom he is preparing for the law. As he meets his wants and payments by his present lectures on phrenology, to which he has attended for many years, he wishes to know, or be reasonably assured, that he can live and meet demands, should he come among us. He knows but little of the States. I said to him if he knew the East as well as I did, he would have no fears, but visit first, and then remove that way to some point. He would prefer preaching in one place, or in a circuit, so as to be home often. His health is good, and could preach in the week. He is seemingly a devoted christian. His history in Scotland is this. He preached to a church of one hundred, six miles from Edinburgh, and when he came out on the life and death question, most all of his church went with him, but wishing to start a paper to advocate his new views, he went to E., hired a hall, etc., at his own risk, gathered a church of seventy, and he and his paper were sustained for three-and-a-half years,—left against their wishes—and for reasons I need not take time to state. They gave him a purse of $400 when he left.

I have been thus minute for the reason that I feel very anxious Bro. M. should some way be induced to come among you. One reason is that, which we all feel,—a want of more liberally educated ministers among us to silence the clamor of the churches, and meet their tallest D. D.'s Another reason is that the call for ministers East is fast increasing, and having had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with Bro. M., I am convinced he is just the addition you need, or as one addition. I know not of another part of the United States were he could be as useful, and be as well sustained in his circumstances. C. W. is fifty years behind the age, and he sees it—sees it is no place to effect, or begin a reform. If you wish to write him, send it to me.

I forgot to say he gets aid as an assistant editor in London.

BRO. GRANT:—The "Crisis" in its new dress has just arrived, and for one I like its appearance, as also the contents of its columns, and hope that it may be a blessing (as it has been heretofore in its old dress,) to many a way-worn pilgrim, and trust that you may have all the needed grace to conduct the same, so that the household of Faith may have "meat in due season;" and that the sinner may find something in it to interest him to seek the pearl of great price, and also that those who profess to love the Lord Jesus, and are perhaps in the position of Apollos, may, by reading the contents of the "World's Crisis," learn the way of God more perfectly.

We are still trying, in our weak way, to proclaim the glorious truths of the Gospel. Quite an interest is manifested in some new places. Hope the glory of God will be manifested in the conversion of some souls to his blessed truth. Some have already confessed with the mouth the Lord Jesus, and will soon, in obedience to the word, go down into the liquid grave. Pray for us, that we may have grace sufficient for our day, and a portion of the same Spirit that John had when he wrote the language of the motto under the heading of the "Crisis," and be enabled to say, Amen, even so come Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

1. If the ambassadors of Christ are the two witnesses of Rev. 11th chap., will they not have the power brought to view in the sixth verse?

2. Is not the sixth trumpet a woe trumpet; and are not the witnesses slain under that trumpet? If not, can we be in the days of the voice of the seventh angel?

3. Are not the witnesses slain by a power that originates from the bottomless pit, and goes out of sight, and re-appears from the same place? Yours wanting light,

Obituary Notices.

Died, at Massena, N. Y., on the 30th Jan., 1859, sister LAURA A. CROWLEY, wife of Bro. Jackson Crowley, and daughter of Bro. Ira and Sr. Rhoda Hodgkins, aged twenty-two years.

Her decease was sudden, and took place under very afflictive circumstances. She had come from her home in Lawrence, and while visiting her parents in Massena, was attacked with malignant scarletina and died in one short week, leaving an infant of but seven days. The little one survives, but she who had but scarcely looked upon her first born—the fond wife and doting mother—is gone to the grave. But she had put on Christ, having obtained a hope in 1853, and was baptized by Eld. S. Roney; she remained in waiting fellowship with the Adventists till the summons came to die. So there is hope in her death that she will rise again at the coming and command of the Savior in whom she trusted. The whole family with Bro. C. are in mourning at this unexpected bereavement, but God is good and will sustain them in the dark and sorrowful hour. Eld. J. H Walden, the Baptist clergyman, officiated at the funeral, preaching a good discourse from Jer. 15: 9,—"She hath given up the ghost; her sun is gone down while it was yet day." God's peace to the stricken heart.

D. T. T.

Died, at Suncook Village, N. H., Sr. MARY PAINE, daughter of Bro. and Sr. John B. Paine, aged eighteen years and two days.

Her disease was consumption of the lungs, occasioned by a scrofulous affection. Although in the bloom of youth, Mary had chosen the better part, and when the hour of her dissolution approached, she met it with a calm serenity of mind, and a holy joy that evinced to all how firm was her hope, and how unwavering her confidence in the promise of Him who has said, "He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Whenever the subject of death was spoken of with reference to herself, her face was lighted with a smile, and she at last fell sweetly asleep as calmly as the setting sun in a cloudless sky, at the close of a lovely day in June.

Bro. and Sr. Paine feel deeply their loss, but still they are greatly comforted in their affliction, feeling that Mary sleeps in Jesus; and when the bright day of eternal bliss shall dawn, they expect to meet her in immortality, in a world of unfading beauty and unending joy, when,

"In that happy, happy land,
They'll no more take the parting hand."

The writer endeavored to comfort the hearts of the mourning ones, and to point an attentively listening congregation to a deathless home, which will soon be enjoyed by all the good in the paradise of God.

S. W. BISHOP.

Died, in Raymond, Me., Feb. 3d, 1859. Bro. JOHN W. DYER, aged sixty-three years.

His sickness was short, but very distressing; and, although he suffered much, was never heard to complain. He left a wife and one son and daughter to mourn his loss. He was among the first that embraced the advent faith in Maine, being then a Methodist preacher. May the Lord bless the wife and children, and sanctify the death of the husband and father to their good. The funeral was attended by the writer, and a sermon preached from Job 14: 10, to a large and attentive congregation. JESSE PARTRIDGE.

Died, in Ossipee, N. H., Feb. 6th, Sr. MARY A., wife of Bro. Hiram Gray, aged thirty-five.

Sr. Gray fell asleep in full faith of soon being raised to a life where consumptions are not known and the parting tear never shed.

The funeral was attended by the writer. Text, (chosen by deceased,) 1 Thess. 4: 14.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per steamship Arabia, which left Liverpool Feb. 26th.

On the 25th, in the Lords, Malmesbury said that Government were led to believe that at no very distant period the Austrian and French troops would evacuate the Roman States, at the request of the Papal Government.

Palmerston called attention to the state of Europe, with the view of inquiring of the government whether they were in a position to make any declaration that peace was not likely to be interrupted, briefly reviewing the present position of Europe, glancing at the warlike preparations everywhere in progress, and avowed his inability to discover any sufficient cause for war, other than the long existing jealousy between France and Austria with regard to Central Italy, brought into more active operation by the joint occupation of the Roman States, and which could only be brought to a termination by the simultaneous withdrawal by these powers of their military occupation. He strongly recommended the government to use their good offices to bring about such a result, and did not despair of success.

Disraeli expressed his conviction that the great powers had no wish to disturb the settlement of 1815, although there were circumstances in regard to Italy calculated to excite apprehension. Government, in face of the warlike preparations going forward, had not been idle in the interests of peace, having availed themselves of the friendly relations in which they stood with both France and Austria; and he had good reason to hope that the Papal States would, ere long, be evacuated by France and Austria, and that with the full concurrence of the Papal government. He might add that Lord Cowley had gone to Vienna on a mission, the exact character of which could not, of course, be stated, but which was one of conciliation. Under those circumstances, he appealed to the House to postpone further discussion on the subject, and trust to the earnest efforts of government to preserve peace and promote the general prosperity of Europe.

Lord Russell expressed the satisfaction which he derived from this statement, and his hope that every effort would be made by all parties to promote the maintenance of peace.

Sir J. Pakington stated that the increase in the number of men for the year will be practically 7000, and the proposed addition to the Navy will be twenty-six powerful steam vessels.

A general meeting of the great ship company had been held at London. It was confidently predicted the great Eastern would be ready by August, and will certainly make a trial trip to Portland.

It is understood that government has intimated to the Galway Atlantic Steam Company that they are prepared to grant a subsidy of £30,000 per voyage, for a fortnightly mail to America, alternating between the ports of New York and Boston; at the same time the company are called on to show they have the necessary pecuniary ability, and are to make arrangements for the construction of vessels suitable in every respect for the service.

FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says he is in a position to state that war is so far resolved on by the French government that the corps which are to commence the campaign have already been designated, and orders have been given to the Minister of War to frame a plan of operations.

It is said the representatives of the foreign courts in Paris have abandoned all hope of a pacific solution.

It is reported that orders to prepare for the campaign in Italy were given by the Emperor immediately after his return from Compeigne.

Another circular has been issued by the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects of Departments, the purport of which is to express the confident hope that if, notwithstanding the Emperor's desire to maintain peace, he should be forced to make war, he may count on the patriotism and devotion of the French people.

A circular from the War Office directs the troops to be trained to forced marches and to night bivouacs. All military surgeons have been ordered to join their corps.

Immense quantities of list have been sent to Lyons. All regiments of Artillery of the Imperial Guard are to be supplied with rifled cannon on a new plan.

The Times' Paris correspondent describes the effect of the news of Cowley's mission to Vienna as very favorable. The speculators regard it as an indication of a good understanding between England and France, and that their united influence will be directed towards inducing Austria to accept a pacific policy. The writer thinks if any one has a chance of bringing the matter to a favorable conclusion, Cowley is the man.

The Patrie looks upon Cowley's mission as showing a renewed tendency on the part of the British Cabinet towards the policy of the Tuilleries.

A letter from Genoa states that the French government had taken up seventeen transport vessels, which are to hold themselves in readiness in that port. It is further stated that a large mercantile house has received orders to store up a considerable quantity of rice at Vercelli and Novara.

AUSTRIA.

The Times' Vienna correspondent says that Count Buol still believes that peace will be maintained, but the Emperor, being of a different opinion, is preparing for a vigorous defence of the Italian States. An official order interdicts exportation of mules and transit horses.

VIENNA. The official Austrian correspondence this evening publishes an Imperial order, addressed to the Minister of War. The order commands the recall of all furloughed soldiers belonging to certain regiments stationed in Italy.

Correspondence points out that the object of these measures is purely defensive. They are adopted in consequence of the warlike preparations of Sardinia. They need not alarm, as the hope must not be renounced that the result of the efforts which are being made in the cause of peace will be attended with success.

The London Times remarks that the truth is, the army in Italy is to be placed on a war footing.

A despatch from Hanover says the Second Chamber have unanimously resolved upon requesting the government to obtain from the Federal Diet resolutions calculated, by their unanimity and energetic execution, to avert the threatened danger of war; but, if necessary, to repel with the united Federal power any attacks on Austria and Germany.

SARDINIA.

It is reported in Turin that Napoleon is shortly expected there on a visit to the King of Sardinia.

The Piedmontese volunteers have been withdrawn from the frontiers of Modena, and ordered to confine themselves to the interior.

ITALY.

At Venice, contracts have been entered into for the construction of three new forts, to be completed in six weeks. It is said that 5000 workmen have been collected from all parts of the Venetian territory, and are already occupied on the works.

A despatch from Milan says fermentation was increasing.

TURKEY.

There has been another dispatch of troops to the Danube. Government was arming six frigates and preparing numerous transports. The destination of these vessels, in case of war, would be the ports of the Adriatic.

The position of Omar Pasha, in the neighborhood of Bagdad, is critical. The Arabs have surrounded him still more closely.

RUSSIA.

The Commercial Gazette, of Berlin, states that it has good authority for believing that the Russian government is negotiating for a loan of £5,000,000 with the Rothschilds.

GREECE.

The Greek Government has demanded a credit of 2,000,000 drachmas in case of need.

FAITH.—Dr. Scudder, in a speech at Philadelphia, related several entertaining anecdotes to illustrate the wit and acumen of the high-caste Hindoos, whom the missionaries find it so difficult to convert. He said:—

In a discourse in which I was speaking of faith, there came to me afterward a noble Hindoo, (and they know how to flatter) and said, "Sir, you speak our language beautifully. I am delighted to hear you. This thing you speak about—faith—is very interesting; but, sir, allow me to remark that a man may be saved whether he has faith or no faith. Do you see this monkey?" In order that you may understand the application, I must inform you that the little monkey lies under the abdomen of the mother, supporting itself with its hands and legs around the body without her assistance and thus she takes it from limb to limb. "Look at the monkey—there is faith. But did you ever see an old cat carry a kitten? She takes it by the back of the neck and walks off with it. That is no faith. If you have faith you will be saved as the young monkey; but if you have no faith you will be carried as the old cat does the kitten." This, doctors, of divinity, is a fair field for you.

Loss and Gain.

Dr. Payson, in his dying hours, said he could have saved himself much trouble in life, if he had only believed that the Savior's presence was enough to fill him with joy, if all worldly comforts were taken away. He found it so in sickness, but could not quite believe it in health. A poor, simple man, with none of Payson's imagination or fancy, once said in a similar spirit, with his dying words:

"I have lost all my property; I have lost all my relatives; my last son is dead. I have lost my hearing and my eyesight; I am all alone, old and poor; but it makes no difference—Christ never grows old; Christ never is poor; Christ never dies, and Christ never will forsake me."

A SINGULAR ANAGRAM.—Some one has discovered the following anagram, the Latin of Pilate's last question to our Savior—"What is Truth?" "Quid est Veritas?" The anagram answers—"Est vir qui adest." [It is the man who is before you.] This example complies with the conditions of a perfect anagram. It employs all the letters—does not depend on pronunciation—and makes the anagramitized sentence an answer to the direct form. And what is most singular, gives the true answer to the question.—New Church Herald.

THE FOREST TREES.—Build your nest on no tree here: for you see God hath sold the forest to death, and every tree upon which we would rest is ready to be cut down, to the end that we may flee and mount up and build upon the rock.—Rutherford.

Appointments.

We would say to our preaching Brn., that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as Tuesday morning, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be in season to be inserted till the week following.

Providence permitting, I will hold a series of meetings in Putnam, Ct., commencing March 16th, and continuing every evening till the 24th.

The Christian Soldier; or, True Patriotism.

A DISCOURSE.—BY WM. SHEPHERD.

"Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life: that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier."—2 Tim. 2: 3, 4.

In the eyes of all holy intelligences, there may not be a more interesting spectacle than the character which forms the subject of our present discourse. There may be other characters of importance, but we may safely affirm none equal to this in the sight of God, and which elicits from him so large a share of attention. There is none more the peculiar object of the divine care and protection than the christian soldier. He certainly stands in a very elevated position in the estimation of Heaven, while all its holy powers are with him in harmonious and congenial sympathy. In contemplating the christian soldier, we will briefly consider him under four general heads:

1. His character.
2. His armor; the nature of his warfare.
3. His success, and certain triumph.
4. His reward in the consummation.

The character of the christian soldier, we would first remark, is clearly portrayed by the sacred penman in the book of God. It is a perfect picture. Let us gaze upon it for a moment. We observe first, in contradistinction from the old, defective man, "one new man;" which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him; God's "workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained," (Eph. 2: 15; Col. 3: 10: Eph. 2: 10.) being renewed also in the spirit of his mind. In a word, he is a new creature, inasmuch "if any man be in Christ Jesus he is a new creature," not will be at some future time, but is now a new creature; "old things have passed away, behold all things are become new;" and he is destined to become, even in physical nature, like unto Christ himself. 2 Cor. 5: 17; Phil. 3: 21. His standard of morals is exceedingly high, yet not higher however than may enable him to attain unto the bright object to which they point, as affirmed by the apostle—"Let every man keep his vessel in sanctification and honor," and in "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Of course he who aspires to obtain an elevated object, must expect to climb full as high as that object may be poised, in order to gain it; so if we expect to inherit everlasting blessings, we must of necessity pursue an unwavering course of holy living, in the brief space allotted to "the life which now is." This comports with the language of that good and tried soldier, Paul,—"But now being made free from sin, and become the servants of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life."—Rom. 6: 22. The soldiers of the various nations of the earth are regulated in their lives, and governed chiefly by their books of army discipline and mere human enactments. They recognize no higher code of morals than what is contained therein. Not so with the christian veteran; he claims God's book—the Bible—to contain his law, the principles of which are to regulate his life, and influence his conduct, and by which he is to be forever guided. He walks worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work; increasing in the knowledge of God."—Col. 1: 10. Having received Christ Jesus the Lord in the divinely appointed way—"buried with him in baptism"—he thus walks in him, rooted and built up in him and established in the faith (i. e., the Abrahamic faith, the same as was once for all delivered to the saints, as taught in the Scriptures of the prophets and apostles,) abounding therein with thanksgiving. And here we would ... how can a man travel a certain road, unless he first gets into it? So he may not acceptably walk in Christ Jesus, unless he is first found in him. It is that "highway" to which Job alludes—"which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen, the lion's whelp hath not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it." Job 28: 7; designated by Solomon "The path of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day;" that way wherein those go from strength to strength, as David declares, until every one of them appeareth before God in Zion.

"My feet shall travel all the length
Of this celestial road,
And march with courage in thy strength,
To see the Lord my God."

And here we remark, that the "new man" is not the result of human contrivance, but the fruit of heavenly parentage. It is exclusively of Deity. This must not, however, preclude the idea of the use of means employed, for God works generally by and through such to accomplish his purposes; thus the old man (the sinner, as he is found in the first or fallen Adam,) is taken by the Almighty through the instrumentalities brought to view in the gospel, and at once stripped of all his rags, filthiness and moral deformities, (Isa. 1: 5, 6; 64: 6); renewed and remodelled, and, like the clay in the hands of Jeremiah's potter, made over into a vessel of honor meet for the Master's use, "by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost;" a process of divine appointment begun by the re-quickening Spirit of God, and carried on by that same Spirit; (as affirmed by the apostle—"He that has begun a good work in you, will carry it on until the day of Jesus Christ." Amen. Praise God for that testimony,) until every thought is ultimately taken into captivity unto the implicit obedience of Christ, until, finally, we behold him a new creature, with deportment, conversation, and all conformed to this transformation, as is implied by the apostle in his letter to the Colossians,—"Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light: who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom (in anticipation) of his dear Son; in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins."—Col. 1: 12–14. The same transformation is taught in his epistle to the saints at Ephesus, thus,—"And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience: among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others. But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved,) and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus."—Eph. 1: 1–7.

O how blest to be engaged in the cause which angels are,
Fighting for the truth and right, battling in this holy war.

But we must abruptly leave this section and come to consider

2. His armor; the nature of his warfare. And here we have it graphically described in the volume of holy inspiration; the most impregnable armor which can be conceived of, from the reflection that it was designed by the Captain of our salvation, who well knew the wants of his men on the field of battle, and what they needed to shield them from the fiery darts of the enemy. We remark that soldiers in an earthly conflict often get defeated, and not unfrequently receive the deadly blow, which may be attributed sometimes to the unskillfulness of their leader in not properly arranging his men—a defect in their panoply and deficiency in their weapons of defence. And such might as frequently occur with the christian warrior, did he but partly prepare for the field; but he is panoplied complete as commanded by his General. His regimentals and implements of warfare are most minutely and beautifully depicted by St. Paul.

First, as a preparatory step, he is exhorted to "be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might;" then to "put on the whole armor of God." "That ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil, for we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, (that be) against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places," or wicked spirits. "Wherefore take unto yourselves the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand; stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness;" not being found in our own righteousness, but in "the righteousness which is of God by faith;" and "your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace," that ye may be fleet and enabled to "run the race with patience." "Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."

Now this shield of faith is possessed of magical influence, and accomplishes wonders. By it all the ancient worthies "obtained a good report," and through it others "subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens; women received their dead raised to life again," etc. And it appears without faith it is impossible to please God.—Heb. 11.

"And the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God."—Now this weapon is of peculiar construction, for it is sharper than any two-edged sword, and being skillfully plied by a good soldier of Jesus Christ, it does signal execution, as Paul mentions in the Hebrews; for it not only perforates the enemy with slight wounds here and there, but it "pierces him" even to the "dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart."—Heb. 4: 12.

But we return to Ephesians, and notice another instrument no less dreaded by the foe than this, and through which remarkable things are consummated; and that is, ALL-PRAYER—"praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit."—Eph. 6: 10–18. This is a powerful weapon, and one that cannot possibly be dispensed with in the conflict, when confronting the enemy. Of its marvelous effects the poet has most truthfully sung:

"Prayer makes the darkened cloud withdraw,
Prayer climbs the ladder Jacob saw,
Gives exercise to faith and love,
Brings every blessing from above.

Restraining prayer, we cease to fight;
Prayer keeps the christian's armor bright,
And Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees."

But these grateful effects are only realized by "praying in the Holy Ghost;" yet, says one, I do not believe in the influence of the Holy Ghost; that was confined to the apostolic age. We know that there are many who presume to deny its immediate influence on the church now, and others affect to be so very fearful of ghosts, that they object to use even the Scripture term to designate this ever blessed and holy COMFORTER of the church, but choose to employ the term "Spirit" in preference; which, when duly examined, according to their own interpretation, means, simply, a spirit which you generate within your own heart by meditating upon God and his written word; as you might cultivate the spirit of Washington, by reading his life. Now such a theory as this may be food to some, but it is no nourishment for us; and for our own part we have no objection to the fellowship of ghosts, so long as they be holy and good; and trust that, through the tender mercies of our divine Parent, we may ever be the highly favored subjects of the Holy Ghost's benign, comforting, and sanctifying influence, and also have the happiness to be found among that number who are ever found "praying in the Holy Ghost, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." This class, you will observe, do not attempt to plead ignorance in regard to the doctrine, as the Ephesians did to Paul, who replied (when he inquired of them whether they had yet received it,) that they had not "so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." Then "he laid his hands upon them," and "the Holy Ghost came on them." Acts 19: 2–6. To return. This panoply is mentioned in other places in Scripture; in the aggregate, as "the armor of light;" "the armor of righteousness;" the expression—"put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ;" having your loins girt about with truth,"—all mean one and the same thing. Such then is the character of his uniform and the nature of his weapon of warfare, which, it is seen, are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan, and bringing either into destruction or subjection all things to Christ. "Holiness unto the Lord" is indelibly inscribed upon his bright escutcheon; he bears the insignia of the cross.

The nature of his warfare is not with a view to gain a "corruptible crown," worldly fame, honor, or applause, not, as the prophet says, that they may have their names "written in the earth," but rather that their names may be enrolled on high,—"written in heaven." They fight, but it is "the good fight of faith," that they may finally lay hold on eternal life, and feel confident in this good fight that they must fight if they would reign, and do not expect to be carried into paradise, or the kingdom of God,

"On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas."

They battle, but it is like the valiant David, in the battles of the Lord, who is himself "a man of war." We find that his most deadly and inveterate enemies are chiefly "the world, and all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," with wicked men and devils: these latter

"Throng the air and darken heaven,
And rule this lower world
With rage that never ends;
Their hellish arts they try,
Legions of dire malicious fiends,
And spirits throned on high."

"Lead Me to the Rock that is higher than I."

PSALM 60: 2.

"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I,
In its shelter I'll hide while the storm passes by.
I'll yield like the floweret that bends to the gale,
And bows without breaking when tempests assail;
Then, rising anew when the storm is o'erpast,
Adore him, who sends both the calm and the blast.

"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I,"
When the glare of the noontide is fierce in the sky.
When faint from the "burden and heat of the day,"
Oh, lead me thy screen from the sun's burning ray!
Within thy cool shadow my altar I'll raise,
And send up the incense of prayer and of praise.

"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I,"
When my path through the desert is scorching and dry,
My spirit shall find her deep craving supplied
In the streams of salvation that flow from thy side,
I'll bathe where thy waters refreshingly stray,
And then with rejoicing go forth on my way.

"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."
When the night wind is chill, to thy covert I'll fly:
Beneath thy protection my couch while I spread,
No damp of the midnight shall fall on my head;
And when the bright morning sheds light through the skies,
My grateful thanksgiving to thee shall arise.

Oh, draw me, kind father, in faith to thy side;
In thy "secret pavillion" I fain would abide.
My Covert in danger, my Screen from the heat,
My spirit's Refreshment, my one sure Retreat,
O strong Rock of Ages, my frailty sustain!
Though mountains should crumble, thou still shalt remain. —Rel. Mag.

Correspondence.

From M. Mathews.

Time still confines us. Eternity is not yet here. We are yet in a land of sickness and death, where hopes die, and flowers fade. Old earth looks gloomy. Still, I can't say that we should at all times say, "Fly swifter round, ye wheels of Time," from the fact that God will not tarry to deliver us one moment beyond the "better time," and we are commanded to "wait with patience."

I think the harvest is whiter than ever. The church seems purer, and the world is really more wicked. We need not look abroad to see this, for right at home the assertion can find foundation. Look at evil in its varied forms, as it creeps in upon the world, and then think how many dear ones are ruined by its sad influences. We cannot say the world is improving, except in wickedness, nor can we look for a temporal millennium, unless our hope is wonderfully developed. Ah, no!

We have lately listened to a few discourses from an Universalist. Let "us from such turn away." It is an error boiled down. What a theory! Every one must be saved at last; no matter what door he enters, heaven is his. But worst of all, he laid aside the Atonement! Thank God that we can see something brighter than death for the "outer man," which he termed the body. It shall yet be made immortal. What a blessed hope is this "Advent hope!" O that all darkness would yield to it!

I cannot help thinking that we ought to write, preach, sing and pray more about the Life and Death question. While its opposers are energetically working, let us rise anew with all our ransomed powers. Let us declare war, and fight manfully. Why sleep? Now is the time for action. Let Repentance preachers hold up the cross awhile, while we show what lies between that and the crown. Who can keep silent when there is such an army as Spiritualists, etc., etc., facing us? I can't. If we do, they'll surely conquer. Our presses and pulpits, highways and hedges are all pouring out something about "mansions in the skies," and I am fairly disgusted with the immortal soul-ism. Can't take up a paper, or book,—hardly a letter,—without reading something about the feelings of that never-dying principle inhabiting the heart. And lately I make it a rule of practice to tie my bonnet tight over my ears, if intending to attend a funeral, for this is just the place to have these can't-be-seen souls buzzing around.

Dear pilgrims, people hate me because I hate death. However, I can never make up my mind to love that monster who laid his icy hand upon my dearest friends long ago, and who has often taken me down to the dark valley and showed me its gloom. O, no! Death wears no light. But with all the revenge of a christian character, I look away to the Resurrection morn when death shall be banished forever.

Well, Bro. Grant, we shall expect much from the Crisis during the year. We expect to read a long list about mortality, spiced with the "glorious hope." And may we as a church keep our lights burning brightly, and at last receive a crown of glory that never will fade away. The night is almost past. Let us be patient to the end. Our "rest" will be sweet, and long will we enjoy it. Courage, then. Adieu.

West Danville, C. E.

From L. L. Howard.

BRO. GRANT:—I think it right to give the readers of the Crisis some account of the state of the cause in the regions where I have been laboring this winter. In Casco, Me., there has been a glorious revival. I visited them the first of December; there had been about twenty-eight converted and reclaimed, and the work was still going on. I had a good season with them, in trying to break the bread of life. About the middle of Dec. I visited Berlin Falls, N. H. God has done a good work for them; they have all been brought into the faith within a year, with one exception. They number about twenty—all in union, looking for the king of Israel. My last meeting with them I shall not soon forget. Two requested prayers, and the people seemed to be feeling the necessity of hiding away from the gathering storm. Bro. Lord, one of the company, a faithful brother, will doubtless feed them with the sincere milk of the word. God give him wisdom.

About the last of Dec. I visited South Hope; found a good company of brethren and sisters. I tarried with them over the Sabbath; had a large and attentive congregation. I next visited the church at Brunswick, Me. They have had some revival among them of late, which has much encouraged their hearts. The first of Jan. I visited Richmond. The company is somewhat feeble, but there are a few faithful ones, who are striving to hold fast. Next came to South Livermore and Hartford. Here a good company have been gathered within a year. Last spring God in mercy sent them a shower of grace, falling gently upon them like the dew upon the mown grass, distilling fragrance in all the region around. Brn. Haggett and Hanscom, who live among them, are faithful laborers in the vineyard of the Lord. Their influence is salutary. From this place sounds out the word of the Lord.

O, what hath God wrought, since our sad disappointment in not seeing our beloved Jesus! He has not left us here in Western Maine without help; he has been pleased to send four of our brethren into the ministry, and they are now preaching those glorious truths which are ripening this generation for the harvest-day of God.

My health is quite poor, still I hope, by the prayers of faith, and a good supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, to continue to preach those glorious truths to which I have been wedded for a few years past.

BRO. GRANT:—The readers of the Crisis may be pleased to learn that there is a remnant of Christ's flock in Mich. still waiting for the inheritance. Scattered, few, and feeble they are, still they rejoice in the confident expectation of overcoming at last. Tried, in common with their brethren, still they delight in the assurance that the trial of their faith shall be found unto praise and honor and glory, at the appearing of our Lord. And who would not be ambitious to gain, and joyful in anticipation of, such praise from the Son of God? to have him say, "Well done," &c.,—to have him own us as his before his Father and the holy angels? Who would not desire that honor which comes from God—to be made a king or priest in God's kingdom—to be made an officer under Christ—to be appointed to rule over two, five or ten cities, as our Lord shall count us capable and worthy? and that glory! such as enshrouded the person of our Lord on the mount. Well may we say with Paul, "our sufferings are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us."

In anticipation of the return of our King, and the establishment of his throne on Mt. Zion, they are striving to so live as to be found worthy of acceptation. Anxious that the misruled governments of earth shall be brought under the wise and beneficent rule of God's Son, they notice with much interest the movements of the Eastern world; so clearly preparatory to the gathering of God's host to, and slaughter in, the land of Israel. After which, the kingdom being again restored to Israel, they hope to participate, as kings and priests, in that blessed reign of Christ; when the so long deferred promise to Abraham, Gen. 22: 17, 18, "and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies: and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," will be gloriously fulfilled.

BRO. GRANT:—My mind has of late been deeply impressed with a sense of personal duty relative to the coming issue; and by the grace of God I have fully awaked from the dreamy slumber of years in which I have been involved, and have resolutely buckled on the armor anew, and am bound to work in every or any way that may present itself for doing good. Sixteen years have passed since the doctrine of a soon coming Savior reached my heart. Thanks be to God, it is as precious now as ever.

Bro. Hicks and myself have been on a tour, circulating the tracts you sent us; and we find thus far good encouragement. We are now on our way to Rochester for a new supply of tracts. If the Lord permit, I shall send you before long $— to help the Crisis.

Christ the Christian's All.

The Scriptures present the Savior as the christian's Fountain, his Food, his Root, his Raiment, his Head, his Hope, his Refuge, his Righteousness, his Light, his Life, his Peace, his Passover, his Portion, his Propitiation, his Freedom, his Foundation, his Wisdom, his Way, his Ensign, his Example, his Door, his Dew, his Sun, his Shield, his Strength, his Song, his Home, his Honor, his Sanctification, his Supply, his Resurrection, his Redemption, his Lesson, his Ladder, his Truth, his Treasure, his Temple, his Ark, his Altar, and his All, and in All! What more can the christian reasonably ask for, or desire? The more grace here, the more glory hereafter.—The higher in grace, the higher in glory.—Then it behooves christians to be faithful in the cause of God. P. TANDY.

Selections.

Holiness to the Lord.

YOU PROFESS IT; DO YOU LIVE IT?

"Teach me to walk as thou didst walk
When a weary pilgrim here."

You profess holiness, do you live holiness? Here lies the test. You tell us you are holy, enjoy the blessing of perfect love; do you practice holiness, live it out? Do you exhibit the fruits of holiness in your family, in your daily and hourly deportment? Is your temper sweet, modest, submissive, Christ-like? Is your walk and conversation such as becometh this high and holy calling? Do they bear a living witness to the fact? Do your friends and companions see "holiness to the Lord" beaming forth brightly in every look, every smile, every word, every moving muscle? Do your little ones see this, your husbands, your wives, your neighbors? Do you exhibit the fruits of the inner life in training your children for the Lord, in the way they should go? How is it also in your dietetic habits, your dress, your furniture, your out goes and in comes?—in all your business transactions? Does the world take knowledge of your holiness, in providing things honest in the sight of all men? Do you owe any man any thing but love? Are you strictly temperate in eating, drinking, sleeping? in the use of all God's gifts? Is your conversation chaste, meek, modest, benevolent, heavenly? Do you exhibit the fruits of holiness in regard to the poor, the sick, the afflicted, the oppressed? Do you, as Christ commands, remember those in bonds, as bound with them? Are you always ready to open your lips, "defend the poor and fatherless," do justice to the afflicted and needy, rid them out of the hand of the wicked, seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widows? Do you everywhere bear testimony against novel readings and novel puffings, intemperance in the use of strong drink and tobacco in every form, the sin of oppression, the spirit of caste, the pride of aristocracy, and every secret abomination? These are test questions, standing out in bold relief, and cannot be lightly passed over, especially by those who profess the higher walks. The eye of God is upon us, the eyes of angels, of the just made perfect, the world's eagle eye also, and its gainsayings. It is one thing to profess sanctification, and quite another thing to live sanctification; our walk must accord with our profession. God expects it, demands it, angels, the world, justly. Holiness, to be holiness, must be Bible holiness, complete, perfectly symmetrical, God like, Christ like. "Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure." What saith God to Abram? "Walk before me and be thou perfect." Christ on the mount commanded the disciples to be perfect.—Paul to the Corinthians, says: "Be perfect, be of one mind, live in peace." "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

Peter also says: (1: 15),—"As he who hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation, because it is written; Be ye holy, for I am holy." "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth, for ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God." "Be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world."

"Abstain from all appearance of evil, and the very God of peace sanctify you wholly." Friends of this high and holy calling, is this Bible holiness your holiness? Are you walking thus circumspectly, keeping a conscience void of offence toward God and man always? Can you testify to these facts, modestly, meekly, humbly, God fearingly? Can you? Bless the Lord, praise him for it.

Your light shall break forth as the morning, the Lord will keep you as the apple of the eye, guide you continually, satisfy your soul in drouth, make fat your bones, and you shall be like a watered garden, and "like a spring of water whose waters fail not."

Nothing so mars the peace of Jerusalem, hinders the onward progress of this blessed Bible doctrine of "holiness to the Lord," as the crooked, inconsistent walk of those professing to enjoy it. Christ is wounded, deeply wounded. By whom? "What are these wounds in thy hands?" Then he shall answer: "Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." Zech. 13; 6.

"Let us, therefore," says Paul, "as many as be perfect, be thus minded. . . . Whereunto we have attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing. Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them who walk so as ye have us for an ensample—for many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ."

'Tis not a cause of small import
A holy life demands,
But what might fill an angel's heart,
And fill the Savior's hands.

The Bible teaches * us that true religion is love to God and love to man, and that there can be no true love to God where there is not love to man. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

* "Who is my brother? 'Tis not merely he
Who hung upon the same loved mother's breast;
But every one, whoever he may be,
On whom the image of a man's impress'd.
True christian sympathy was ne'er designed
To be shut up within a narrow bound;
But sweeps abroad, and in its search to find
Objects of mercy, goes the whole world round.
'Tis like the sun, rejoicing east and west,
Or beautiful rainbow bright from south to north;
It has an angel's pinion, mounting forth
O'er rocks and hills and seas, to make man bless'd.
No matter what their color, name or place—
It blesses all alike, the universal race."
—Golden Rule.

☞ I have known some men possessed of good qualities, which were very serviceable to others, but useless to themselves; like a sun-dial on the front of a house, to inform the neighbors and passengers, but not the owner within.

☞ Difference of faculty, or character, or disposition, or habit, whether of the will or of the understanding, by no means implies the inferiority of one person to another, and still less that one is wrong and the other right.

Lights and Shades.

The gloomiest day hath gleams of light,
The darkest wave hath bright foam near it,
And twinkles through the cloudiest night
Some solitary star to cheer it.

The gloomiest soul is not all gloom,
The saddest heart is not all sadness,
And sweetly o'er the darkest doom,
There shines some lingering beam of gladness.

Despair is never quite despair;
Nor life, nor death, the future closes;
And round the shadowy brow of care,
Will hope and fancy twine their roses.

The Almond Blossom.

"Dear mother," said a little girl, as they were walking together in the garden, "Why do we have so few of those beautiful double almonds in the garden? You have hardly a bed where there is not a tuft of violets, and they are so much plainer! What can be the reason?"

"My dear," said the mother, "gather me a bunch of each. Then I will tell you why I prefer the humble violet."

The little girl ran off and soon returned with a fine bunch of the beautiful almond blossoms and a few violets.

"Smell them, my dear," said her mother, "and try which is the sweetest."

The child smelled again and again, and could scarcely believe herself that the lovely almond had no scent, while the plain violet had a delightful odor.

"Well, my child, which is the sweetest?"

"Oh, dear mother, it is the violet!"

"Well, you know, now, my child, why I prefer the plain violet, to the beautiful almond. Beauty without fragrance is like beauty without gentleness and good temper. When any say to you, 'What charming blue eyes! What a fine complexion!' without knowing whether you have any good qualities, and without thinking of your defects and failings, remember that beauty without gentleness and good temper is worthless."—Ex.

Ill Manners about Home.

BE STILL, LITTLE FOLKS.

Be still, hush, when people are talking or reading. It is ill manners to break in, by your loquacity and impertinence. We see children sometimes, that ought to know better, and do know better, and whose parents ought to know better, and who do know better, than to sanction this impolite interruption. This continued rattle and tattle of the little folks is very annoying. The tongues of some boys and girls are like millclappers, or a flock of bobolinks. Little friends, are you not ashamed of this rattlety bang course? We are pleased always to see children sociable, use their little tongues on proper occasions, modestly and respectfully, but never should they take the lead in conversation when their superiors are present, and especially should they be cautious and not interrupt others.

Young readers, will you please bear these hints in mind, demean yourselves courteously at all times, especially when visitors are present? The tongue is a little member and boasteth great things. Parents, will you see that your children are quiet, orderly; teach them when to speak and how to speak; and when to be silent, especially in the presence of their superiors? 'A fool's voice is known by a multitude of words.' Again Solomon says: 'A fool's mouth is his destruction.' 'He that keepeth his mouth keepeth his life.'—Ex.

Be Kind.

"Oh," said a little girl, bursting into tears on hearing of the death of a playmate, "I did not know that was the last time I had to speak kind to Amy."

The last time they were together she spoke cross to her, and the thought of that last cross word now lay heavy on her heart.

This suggests a good rule about kind words. Speak kindly to your father, or your mother, or your brother, or your sister, or your playmate, or your teacher, or the poor, when you are speaking, lest it may be your last time to speak to them. Cross words are very, very sorrowful to think of.

Bible Facts Gleaned from the Original Scriptures.

Begotten, Born. Are they of the same or different significations? As there are many who hold to the opinion that the two words, begotten and born, have different meanings, both in the English and in the Greek; and that to beget and is begotten refer merely to the act of conception, while, to bear, to bring forth, and is born, refer to the act of ushering into a breathing existence; and as there are others who hold to the opposite view, giving them but one meaning, though used under different circumstances, I have been requested to state a few facts, in my possession, which may aid in determining the truth with respect to a question which has often troubled many minds.

1st. The two words, begotten and born, are always rendered from the same Greek word, although different words may be used in the original to state the same fact. These words are Ektroma, Tikto, Apokueo and Gennao, in the New Testament.

Ektroma is found once in 1 Cor. 5: 8; rendered in the English version, "one born out of due time;" literally, an abortion.

Apokueo, from apo and kueo. Kueo, of itself, means to conceive; with apo, to bring forth, to adopt as one's child; found in Jas. 1: 15; rend., bringeth forth death; in v. 18, rend. begat.

Tikto, to beget, to bring forth young; to produce young, said of both sexes; found in Matt. 1: 21, 28, 25; Luke 1: 21; 2: 7; Heb. 6: 7; Jas. 1: 15; Rev. 12: 5, 13; rend. "brought forth." In Matt. 2: 2; Luke 2: 11, rend. is born. In Luke 1: 57; 2: 6, rend. "should be delivered." Heb. 11: 11, rend. "was delivered." Rev. 12: 2, 4, "to be delivered." Gal. 4: 27, "bearest," or bring forth. John 16: 21, rend. "is in travail;" i. e, in the act of bringing forth. These are all spoken with respect to the female, the mother.

Prototakos from protos and tikto, in Matt. 1: 25; Luke 2: 7; Rom. 8: 29; Col. 1: 15, 18, rend. "first-born." In Heb. 1: 6 and Rev. 1: 5, rend. "first-begotten." In the first case God is spoken of as the author—he is understood as the author of the birth; in Heb. 11: 28, neuter plural, and 12: 23 neuter singular; it is rend. "first-born," the author not being named.

Gennao, in the active voice, spoken of men, to beget; spoken of women, to bear or bring forth; in the passive voice, of one in relation to the father, is begotten; of one in relation to the mother, is born; when the gender cannot be distinguished, either begotten or born, as is most euphonious to the ear; also, to produce, give occasion to. It is found in Matt. 1: 2, three times; 1: 3, three times; in vers. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, once, "begat," and once, "was born," 20 v.; 2: 1, 4; 19: 12; 26: 24; Mark 14: 21; Luke 1: 13, 35, 57; 23: 29; John 1: 13; 3: 3, 4, twice; 5, 6, twice; 7, 8; 8: 41; 9: 2, 19, 20, 32, 34; 16: 21, once, "is delivered," once, "is born;" 18: 37; Acts 2: 8; 7: 8, 20, 29; 13: 33; 22: 3, 28; Rom. 9: 11; 1 Cor. 4: 15; Gal. 4: 23, 24, 29; 2 Tim. 2: 23; Philem. 10; Heb. 1: 5; 5: 5; 11: 12, 23; 2 Pet. 2: 12; 1 John 2: 29; 3: 9, twice; 4: 7; 5: 1, three times rend. "is born," "that begat," "that is begotten;" 5: 4, 18, twice, rend. "is born" and "is begotten."

In order to follow the rule for translation, is born, in 1 John 2: 29; 3: 9; 4: 7; 5: 1, 4, 18, should be rendered begotten, for the Scriptures always present God unto us in the masculine gender; besides, in 1 John 2: 29, it is not according to good English usage to say, "born of him." If the word born is used it ought to be, unto him. Macknight translates this passage, hath been begotten of him; and in a note says: "This is the literal signification of gegennetai from gennao. Accordingly, our translators have so rendered the word, chap. 5: 18. Besides, 'born of God' is an idea no where else found in scripture," meaning no where else than in this epistle of John.

In Murdock's translation of the Syriac, he uniformly puts it, "born of God," not ascribing to him any gender. Macknight renders 1 John 3: 9—"Whosoever hath been begotten of God doth not work sin; because his seed abideth in him; and he cannot sin, because he hath been begotten of God."

Were I to translate these passages, I would first determine the meaning of the English terms, born and begotten. If they meant the same, I would translate, is begotten of God. If begat and begotten meant to conceive, I would be compelled to translate, is born of God; and in all other passages where begat is used, it should be "unto (him) is born" (a son or daughter.) The reason is, there is but one word in Greek, and that is the usage of that word, as may be seen by referring to the Septuagint version, as well as its use in the New Testament.

In referring to Gen. 5: 3, we find the same word used. We read, "And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness after his image; and called his name Seth: and the days of Adam, after he had begotten Seth, were eight hundred years; and he begat sons and daughters. And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years: and he died." Now add the one hundred and thirty years of the third verse to eight hundred of the fourth, and you have nine hundred and thirty, the exact age of Adam as stated in the fifth, showing that the reckoning is from the birth of Seth, not his conception; showing, also, that in the English, begotten and born had the same signification at the time our translation was made, whether it be so now or not.

In Gen. 10: 1, the same word is rend. not they begat sons, but "unto them sons were born after the flood." In Gen. 17: 20, it reads, "twelve princes shall he beget," i. e., be the father or ancestor of. Gen. 48: 6, rend. "and thy issue, which thou begettest after them." Eccl. 5: 14.—"He begetteth a son;" compare it with next verse. Isa. 9: 6, "is born." 39: 7; Jer. 2: 27; Zech. 13: 3, and many other passages. In the New Testament, 1 Cor. 4: 15, it is rend. "Yet have ye not many fathers; for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you: wherefore be ye followers of me;" and Philem. 10.

2d. Gennao, the term rendered begotten, may, under some peculiar circumstances, refer to what is prior to birth, but never when a breathing intelligence is spoken of. We never speak of one as a person, until he or she is born, when that person is made the object of the accompanying verb. A person cannot be a son or daughter before a separate existence is begun. The term begotten is used to show the paternal, as born of the maternal relation. There is one instance in the whole Bible where gennao or rather the first aorist neuter passive participle from gennao, is rendered "conceived." It is in Matt. 1: 20. In this instance, the word is used as it would be were anything inanimate spoken of; therefore the neuter is used. The meaning is, that which is produced or formed. It could not in this instance be rendered conceived, were it not in connection with the phrase, en aute, (in her) which qualifies the meaning. I have four parallel passages in which the participle, without this phrase, is rendered differently. Luke 1: 35, fut. pass. part. "shall be born." Rom. 9: 11, aorist pass. part. with negative, rend. "being not yet born." Heb. 11: 23, aorist pass. part., rend. "when he was born." And 2 Pet. 2: 12, perf. pass. part., rend. "made." So Matt. 1: 20, might be rendered being born or about to be born. The present participle always refers to what is prior to that expressed by the verb. In order to determine whether begotten means conceived, substitute that word in all the passages given, and you will then know the fact, by the sense of the passage.

3d. There are other words to express other relations, as Ginosko, to know, found in Matt. 1; 25; Mark 5: 29; Luke 1: 34. Sullambano, to conceive, found in Luke 1: 24, 31, 36; 2: 21; Phil. 4: 3; James 1: 15. Tithemi, Acts 5: 4. Koite, Rom. 9: 10. Eko, to have, found in Matt. 1: 18, 23; 24: 19; Mar. 13: 17; Luke 21: 23; Rom. 9: 10; 1 Thess. 5: 3; Rev. 12: 2.

4th. In this connection we find Anagennao, rend. in 1 Pet. 1: 3, "begotten again;" verse 23, "being born again." Also Palingennesia, from palin and genesis; Gignomai, to exist or live again, new birth or new existence; and found in Matt. 19: 28, and Titus 3: 5. Anakainidzo, to inaugurate anew.—Heb. 6: 6. Anakainoo, to make new, to alter.—2 Cor. 4: 16, and Col. 3: 10. And Anakainosis, making anew.—Rom. 12: 2; Titus 3: 5. As the New Testament was written in Syriac Greek, not Attic Greek, the sense of a passage must be determined by the context, and the use of the language in the Septuagint and Hebrew versions. Let each one examine and judge for himself.

THE GOOD WIFE.

Arbitress of man's destiny!
From thy sweet lip one tender sigh—
One glance from thy approving eye—
Can raise or bind him at thy will,
To virtue's noblest flights or worst extremes of ill."

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 16.

My Dear Sister:—Perhaps it may not be amiss to express a few thoughts to you in relation to the devices of Satan. Some few years since, being overtaken during a journey by a violent storm, shelter was sought and obtained at a farm-house. I was much gratified, soon after entering the house, by seeing a No. of a periodical, devoted to the promotion of holiness, lying upon the table. An opportunity being afforded me before leaving in the morning to introduce the subject, we entered into conversation respecting it. She told me some of her experience. At times her mind had been deeply awakened to a sense of her duty to attain to that state of purity and perfection of love set forth on the pages of that periodical, and enjoined upon her in the word of God. She stated frankly, why it was that she did not yield to those convictions. One was, her husband's mother lived in the house, and she feared that her daily walk before her, might not always be in harmony with such a profession, and reproach be thereby cast upon her, and the doctrine of holiness. Another was, that they had boarders, and if she took upon herself that high and holy profession, she would deem it her duty to attend to family devotions, and invoke a blessing at the table in the absence of her husband, and she felt that she was wholly insufficient for these things, and she shrank from the cross.

I asked her if God did not demand the consecration and the profession at her hand? She acknowledged that it was so. Are you not then living in a state of condemnation, while refusing to comply with his requirements? She replied that it was so. And now, my dear sister, let me tell you that you never will enjoy justification before God, until you come fully up to the standard of piety that has been presented before you—you must experience that, and take upon you its responsibilities, before your soul can be delivered from its bondage. Another thing, when you experience this entire sanctification of your whole being to God, what now appears to you a great hindrance and heavy crosses, will then become easy by reason of the abundant grace bestowed. She admitted the correctness of my remark, and gave me encouragement to hope that she would soon consecrate all to God.

The point I wish you to notice particularly in this incident is this: Satan's device to keep her back from the blessing for which the Spirit of God had convicted her. It is impossible for those who have been enlightened on this subject, and felt the Spirit of God convicting them of their need, to resist their convictions—to refuse to listen to and obey the divine call, by reason of the responsibilities connected therewith, and yet retain their justification before God. We must keep pace with the shining light, or be left in darkness.

A lady who was very retiring in her manners, and extremely diffident, when addressed upon this subject, replied, "O I never could speak of it before others;" but, when at length she yielded to the solicitations of her friend, and sought for that "perfect love" which casteth out the fear of man, what was the result of that holy baptism of fire which descended upon her soul? It was but a little time when, before assembled thousands, she was proclaiming Jesus' power to "save to the uttermost," and urging home upon the ministers at the stand the duty of their being fully saved from sin, with a burning eloquence that thrilled the hearts of those who heard her! Satan's device was foiled!

"You cannot retain the blessing, if you obtain it." Too successful has Satan been with this device. But the affirmation of the inspired apostle; "Faithful is he who hath called you, who also will do it," applies to the being "preserved blameless" equally with the being sanctified wholly. The apostle had faith to believe that God would keep that which he had committed to him, even unto the day of Christ's appearing, and he says at one time to his brethren, "God is faithful who will also stablish you, and keep you from all evil." The promises of being "preserved blameless," are sufficient to warrant our faith, and they go to help form the two-edged sword of the Spirit, with which every device of Satan must be resisted.

Heresy Hunting at Fault.

What is the matter? why this ominous silence of the Argus-eyed guardians of orthodoxy and creedism in all our churches? Are they all dumb dogs that cannot bark, or are they so tender mouthed they will not bite? Or are the sectarian periodicals so deeply engaged in quarreling over their own bones of contention, that they have neither time nor inclination to attend to anything out of this narrow circle?

Does the religious press need to be informed that heresies of the most dangerous and destructive character are sweeping over the land, and even boldly assailing the church itself in its strong holds of sectarianism? The long cherished doctrine of the immortality of the soul is brought in question, and denied by many. Even the dead in Christ are robbed of their reward at death, and have to wait for it till the resurrection of the just. The unrighteous dead are not now alive in torment, but silent in hades, till the judgment of the great day; when they will be punished with everlasting destruction, and doomed to the second death, in a lake of fire and brimstone, prepared for the final extinction of all evil from the universe of God. The good time coming of a spiritual millennium, and the conversion of all nations to our church and our creed, is by these heretics set at nought, and the speedy coming of Christ to judge the quick and the dead, is putting these fond sectarian dreams to flight.

In the midst of these most dangerous foes to orthodoxy, what is become of our Boanerges's, sons of thunder, zealous opposers of all innovations in the church? Are they taking a comfortable nap in the bed of carnal security, saying, to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant? Or are they preparing their weapons for a grand and simultaneous assault, that shall at once and forever annihilate all opposition? Or are they afraid to agitate these questions before the public, not being sure of victory, and acting on the old adage, "discretion is the best part of valor?" There must be some reason for this silence, this effort to exclude, to shut out from the public mind all knowledge and inquiry on these subjects of vital interest to all men.

If the religious press is what it pretends to be—a champion for the faith once delivered to the saints—it is time to be up and doing; to treat these subjects with silent contempt will not avail much longer. Come forward, brethren, boldly, and in the face of day like men; let us have your strong arguments from the Bible, to prove beyond a doubt the immortality of the soul. This is the grand point; only prove this, and your way will be clear. But you know that, if you fail here, your whole system falls to the ground. Why not open your columns to a calm and christian discussion on this subject? You have every possible advantage on your side in the affirmative; the prejudice of education; the belief of ages; all the popular creeds; all sorts and degrees of literature, sacred and profane; self-interest, and the pride of human nature, that loves to boast of immortality. To possess all these advantages, is almost half the victory with many; why, then, hesitate? It is not because you love peace so well on other subjects; week after week you are "pitching into" one another without measure or mercy, on trifles of little moment; splitting hairs of difference, to sow discord amongst brethren, and so as to be fairly entitled to belong to the true church militant.

It is out of the question to keep these subjects in the back ground much longer; you may as well "make a merit of a necessity," and meet the question of "immortality" fairly and honestly. If man was created immortal, he cannot die; he cannot perish in the grave, or hades; he cannot rise from the dead; he cannot be indebted to Christ for eternal life; he must live on, and live ever, either in weal or woe; and surely if the popular doctrine be true, that millions of our race are now, and will forever exist in torment beyond all redemption, this awful fact should be so clear, so plainly revealed in the word of God, and so constantly proclaimed in public and in private, that none can have any excuse in being ignorant of the fearful condition in which they live! A God of mercy could not surely keep his creatures in ignorance of such a penalty to his broken law; yet where is it to be found? For four thousand years, there is not a word that can be twisted or tortured to make out anything but death as the penalty of sin. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." This is the uniform language of the Bible; and suppose I choose to believe just what God has said, and take him at his word, could I be justly condemned for so doing? Will he torture forever the creatures he has made, because they could not understand that death meant life, that destruction meant to be preserved, that to be burned up meant to be kept alive forever in torment? Is any other doctrine taught in this way, to be read like Hebrew, backwards? Let us try the experiment and see how it reads. "God commandeth all men, everywhere, to repent." Does this mean that God commandeth no man, any where, to repent? Or does it mean just what it says? Then why not so in every other place? We can understand what is meant by death, as well as what is meant by repentance; and I have just as much authority to say that repentance means continuing in sin, instead of turning away from it, as to say that death means life, instead of ceasing to live. But this is the spiritual mode of interpretation, by which we are to understand the easy way in which we can get rid of any doctrine or practice that does not square with our preconceived opinions, prejudices or predelictions. All we have to do is to turn it into a fable, an allegory, or an eastern metaphor.

In this way the word of God has been abused and mystified by crafty commentators and theologians, in all ages, to suit their own selfish purposes; that the people are led to believe that the Bible is a book of cunningly devised fables and riddles; that can be made to prove anything that a fertile imagination can invent, or a crafty priesthood can make use of for their own secular advantage, and the promotion of their own praise and glory.

This most unfair and dangerous way of interpreting Scripture, has done more to encourage infidelity and scepticism in this country, than any other means the enemy could have invented; and not till this system is frowned down by professing christians, and we return to the plain and simple teaching of the word of God, can we reasonably hope to see the triumph of christianity over impiety and infidelity.

Hattie.

We are lonely now in our home on the hill!
There are empty places with none to fill—
There are tiny robes with none to wear,
For our darling Hattie is not there.

There's a little one missing when the table's spread—
A little one missing from the cradle bed;
There's a little one gone from the little chair,
For our darling Hattie is not there.

There are broken toys scattered about our home,
Where our darling one was wont to roam,
With her laughing eye and waving hair,
But now our darling is not there.

She's lying asleep on the hill-side lone,
Where the wild wind sighs its plaintive tone,
With her tiny hands on her bosom fair,
Our darling Hattie is sleeping there.

But Hattie will not forever sleep;
O, then for her we will not weep:
In the world to come, that Eden fair,
We'll find our darling Hattie there.

Correspondence.

From D. D. Chaffee.

Bro. Grant:—Sr. Mathewson's very excellent letter to Bro. H. L. H., in the Crisis of Jan. 12th, interested me so much that I responded to it by a letter directly to her, at the same time hesitating whether to do so, or through the Crisis. But, as I had never written but one prose article for publication—always distrusting my own ability to do so acceptably—I was led to adopt the course I did. But now, as Sr. M. has suggested that my response to her in substance appear in the Crisis for the eyes of the household, I present it. And perhaps I may as well present it verbatim, or as near as the original may be like the copy sent.

Dear Sr. Mathewson:—I feel grateful to you for your very timely letter to Bro. H. L. H. in the Crisis, it is so expressive of my own feelings on that subject.

Since 1842, I have much of the time stood alone here on the doctrine of the second personal appearing of Jesus Christ being near at hand, and kindred points growing out of it. And I do not desire to have my identity blended with any people who are indifferent even (to say nothing of a spirit of opposition) on such (to me) vital subjects. I love them still, yea, dearly. And I desire a distinctive name—one that will express, as much as may be, all the difference there is between myself and those differing so widely from me. There may be a few in the churches who believe in the speedy personal appearing of Jesus Christ to raise the dead, and reinstate the righteous in the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world. But how is it with the great mass of professors? "Is their hope as our hope?" Do they believe their eternal well-being depends on his personal appearing? No, certainly not. If they do, why do they not preach it? It is but a secondary matter with them. They may say it is not. But the very fact that they expect to go to heaven by death, instead of the resurrection, belies all their professions on that point. For, if death is the door to glory, then Christ by the resurrection is not. Consequently their faith makes our hope vain. And Christ as the resurrection and the life, is set aside, and death placed in His stead. Can we, therefore, permit our identity to be swallowed up in theirs? Would not that put our light out?

God has his light-houses all the way down the coast of time, and if Adventists are not one, then some other people are, and if so, who are they? Each light-house must be known by its peculiar light, else how should we know our whereabouts? And if scintillations of new light (new or present truths) are not thrown out by Second Adventists, by whom are they? Is there any other light about us that will answer our purpose, if ours is put out? Can we expect anything but destruction, if our light should go out? Do we not know even that if Christ does not come to raise the dead and change the living, that our hope is vain, and we are yet in our sins?

O, no, sister, we cannot spare our light. It is not one of our own kindling, but one lit up by the finger of God, which all men may see who can read his word, if they are not too deeply enveloped in the mists of School Theology.

But who hath made us to differ? Ought we not to be very grateful to God that he has brought us to rise above such mists, and to see such beauties and glories in his word—that we have been enabled by that word to discover our whereabouts, to ascend the mount and discover the promised land, so long claimed to be "beyond the bounds of time and space?" O, is not the thought good? Is is not ravishing even, sometimes, to know there is a land ahead, where we can exult in all the glory of God, where sorrow and sighing shall flee away?

Where heart with heart shall blend as one,
And glory reign around.

May God in mercy grant us an abundant entrance into that kingdom. Amen.

Yours in the faith of the gospel of the kingdom.

Bro. Grant:—Having been edified and encouraged by the weekly visits of the "Crisis," and feeling a deep interest in the glorious truths it advocates, believing them to be of God, I hope and pray that it may be sustained and continue to spread the truth as it is (not in the creeds) in Jesus. And may God bless you, and give you a mouth of wisdom, that your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist. I herewith send you three new subscribers with the money enclosed.

Southington, Ct.

From Eld. I. C. Welcome.

Bro. Grant:—Perhaps it may be of interest to some of the lovers of Christ to hear how the work is going on in this part of the field.

Since attending our conference in the autumn, I have visited the brethren in Belgrade; but hearing that there was to be an important meeting in Rome, the adjoining town, I thought best that we all attend it. The object of that meeting was, to refute our teachings of the word of life; we did attend, and, I think, learned something more of the depravity of man, and danger of unbelief. The believers seem to be doing well, and living for the kingdom and eternal life. I preached in Rome twice, and had a good season in trying to edify and comfort the flock of God with the word of life, and lead sinners to repentance. I called on Bro. H. B. Sevey, and found him, as ever, heartily engaged in the work of the Lord, at all times, and in the hardest places. God gives him success in his ministry, and sinners are converted. I also visited Vassalboro, and intended to go to Albion, but was prevented by the weather. I attended a Baptist quarterly meeting, did what I could in the cause, found an open door, conversed a half day with one of the ministers, who never heard from us face to face before. I laid open to him an index of the whole doctrine, with the proofs. He confessed that he had received light for which he was glad, and would look into the subject. May God lead him into the truth. I also visited the brethren in Lisbon, and had pleasant times with them, in West Topsham also, but had no time to stop and preach. The weather was such at the time of our quarterly conference in Livermore, I could not get there; but I attended the one at Bristol, which was very profitable for the cause of truth. The disciples are holding fast, and the influence of truth widening in the community. Called on Bro. J. Campbell and family at Damariscotta, who, with his faithful wife, is standing firm in the faith. I spent one Sunday in Newcastle, and preached; had an interesting day. The Lord blessed us indeed; the believers are still looking for the coming of the Lord with earnest desire.

In Feb. I visited the brethren in Brunswick, attended their monthly conference, found them active in the faith, and enjoying the blessed hope. We were invited to assist in "setting in order the things that were wanting;" we did so, and a church was organized by choice of Bro. Geo. H[illegible]land for deacon. May God bless and sustain them in every good work. I spent Sunday and Monday evening with them, to preach the word, and was blessed indeed. The cause is advancing there, and the brethren are much encouraged by the late converts to the faith, who are zealous in the work.

I then returned to fill my monthly appointment at home, after which I went to Whitefield, called on Eld. S. K. Partridge, and attended an interesting prayer meeting in the Bates' District, where an interest in the truth has sprung up under Bro. P.'s labors. Several have been converted, and are waiting for the kingdom to come. I preached once in what is called the Partridge District, and enjoyed a pleasant season with the few who still hold the ministry of the faith with a pure conscience.

Went to Augusta; found things in a bad state. Some of those who never originated a cause, or whose labors never result in converting sinners, nor in uniting saints in the faith, but who hunt out the flocks raised up under the labors of others, and live on them, and scatter and divide them, by such messages as—that christians must sell all they have,—have all things common,—that it is wicked to pray before sinners,—hypocrisy to pray in public, and all that class of folly. The seed sown had sprung up; some of the brethren had been misled, division had taken place, as the more experienced of the brethren had concluded not to give any countenance to such destructive notions. I was very sorry to be obliged to enter upon a warfare again on this old and miserable subject, which has done so much mischief among us heretofore.

I next went to South Livermore and commenced a protracted meeting, in company with Brs. Haggett and Hanscomb. The weather was very unpleasant for two weeks, but we held meetings in the above named place, in Hartford, and in East Livermore, during the time, and had very pleasant and profitable meetings. There is an open ear to hear, and the truth is progressing in all that community, under the faithful labors of those brethren above mentioned. May the Lord still lead them, and soon gather us into his kingdom.

"Just as I am, and waiting not
To rid my soul of one dark blot,
To Thee, whose blood can cleanse each spot,
O, Lamb of God, I come."

For the Crisis.

Thoughts of our Savior.

My meditations of the blessed Lamb of God are sweet. I love to think of him at all times, and under all circumstances as he was, as he is, and as he is to be. I love to think of him as he was, a sweet, innocent child in Bethlehem's manger, with no softer bed than hay. He, the lovely child, is destined to be the ruler of nations. To him "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." O christians, have we not an example worthy of imitation in this sinless One? Should we not be willing, if needful, to endure for him what he has for us? When he was reviled and persecuted, spit upon, and called all manner of evil names, he could in the humility of his spirit exclaim, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." He was not only born in a manger, but roamed a pilgrim and stranger o'er the earth, of whom it was said, "The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

Contrasting the now professed christian with him, how few do we find who are in any wise willing to walk in his footsteps in this respect; but on the contrary, unless they abound in wealth, and possess all the luxuries of life, will murmur, and complain that they are not more bountifully blessed by Providence. They even forget that he has told us to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread;" also, that he has said, "If he so clothe the grass of the field which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith!"

I love to think of him as he went down into the water to be baptized of John in Jordan, when the Spirit of the Lord descended upon him in the form of a dove, and there came a voice from heaven saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Oh! what a beautiful expression coming from the lips of a father! Even we too, may hope to be imbued with his Spirit, if we follow thus his example.

I love to think of him as he entered with his disciples the garden of Gethsemane. Pause, and listen to his mournful cry as he kneels to pray; "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death!" Hear him, as in deep imploring tones he prays, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." I love to think of him as hanging bleeding, groaning, dying, on Calvary's tree, for poor sinful men; even then, with calm resignation, he could exclaim, "It is finished." Though the thought of such a scene is painful in the extreme, yet it brings happiness, for thereby we are led to see our indebtedness to him and to serve him more devotedly.

I love to think of him as he now is, a mediator between God and man, pleading more earnestly than a father would plead for the life of his child. O sinner, shall that sweet voice once hushed in death but now interceding for you, plead in vain!

I love to think of him as he is to come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. Let us be always longing and looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all inquity, and purify us unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. Charity.—No. 3.

"Charity" is estimated above "faith" in value; "Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not Charity, I am nothing."—1 Cor. 13: 2. What an exhibition of marvelous wonders would "all faith" produce! The world would look on in amazement at the removal of "mountains;" or the great changes, physical, mental, or moral, it might effect in our world. But of what avail or good would it be without "Charity?"

What would the wondrous and unlimited faith of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, have effected for the good of our race, or that of the universe, had He been destitute of love? He would be a Monster Fiend, greater than Beelzebub himself, who, with the power of God, would have turned the world into a Bochim and Aceldama, and spread universal terror and ruin in earth and the heavens. "God is love." He is love; and love "through all" His "actions run." What wondrous love His works exhibit! His faith and love heals the maladies and infirmities of our race;—alleviates the sorrows and sufferings of the oppressed, and will bring everlasting life to the dead in Him; and restore ruined earth to Eden and Paradise again.

"Faith" without "Charity" is Sampson fighting the Philistines ever; catching foxes and tying fire-brands between their tails and setting them loose in the corn-fields, to destroy their harvest, and cut off the supply of bread; and at last in Dagon's temple feeling for the pillars upon which it rests to pull it down upon the thousands congregated within and then to die in wide and universal ruin! "Faith" [illegible] "Charity" is Jesus Christ, "despised and rejected of men," yet seeking to bless [illegible];—weeping over Jerusalem, and [illegible] in pains who refuse His salvation, and are ready to put Him to death; and when upon the cross, pleads for forgiveness for His enemies, to avert the merited doom hanging over them, and by His faith, prevailing so that mercy is offered, and everlasting good is secured to thousands of his enemies and murderers, and all who will believe on Him, however great their offence may be!

May we not simply have "faith" to torment, like Sampson, the Lord's enemies; but with "faith,"—love,—charity,"—to forgive their insults, plead for their salvation, and win them to Christ. The Lord increase both our faith and charity.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 23, 1859.

Discussion.—We are to have a discussion at the Quinnebaug Hall, Putnam, Ct., with Mrs. C. M. Tuttle, a distinguished trance-speaking medium, on Thursday evening, March 24th, commencing at 7 o'clock. Subject—Resolved, "That the Bible, facts and philosophy, teach the immortality of the soul."

☞ Some of our subscribers complain that they do not get their papers, especially for the last two weeks. We think the difficulty arises from the change which has been made in the removal of the post office in this city. Bags full of papers by the hundred have been found lying over in the office, when they should have reached their destination. Our papers leave this office regularly every Wednesday. If we could, we would supply all back numbers, but this is impossible. There are constant demands on these from new subscribers. We think you will get the papers more punctually hereafter.

"The Late Revival."

It is well known, that many thought the millennium had commenced, when the great and unparalleled religious interest swept over our world, a little more than one year since. At that time, some who had preached for years, confessed they never before knew anything about experimental religion. All denominations were satisfied, especially the more devotional part, that the sectarian walls and prejudices were all wrong, dishonoring to the cause of Christ, and exerting a very deleterious effect upon society, and were very thankful that the Lord had shown them this fact and enabled them to unite heart and hand with christians of all denominations.

After acknowledging this fact, and receiving great blessings while acting out the union spirit, "making christian character the only test of fellowship and communion," we should not suppose that, in a few months, many of these same individuals would go at work again with earnestness to rebuild the walls of sectarianism, which they so recently helped demolish, confessing, at the time, that all such walls were contrary to the gospel of Christ, and that they had built them while in their backslidden state. But so it is.

Again, it was also confessed and believed by all who shared in the blessings of the late revival, which swept o'er the land and sea, that the churches had not only been sectarian to a high degree, but had been most sadly conformed to the WORLD; so much so, that there would have been but little hope of their salvation, had they been called to judgment from such a state. Could we have then supposed, that within one year they would relax to their former low condition, and even to a worse one? The anticipated millennium has proved to be one of very short duration, but as long as any we may expect, before the second personal coming of Christ.

How long before men will give up the fabled doctrine of the conversion of the world, and preach the truth of the Bible on this subject, showing the people that the next great event—the coming of the Lord—is close at hand?

The leading paper of the Baptist denomination in Boston, complains that "there has never been among the Baptists so lamentable a spread of church dissension as prevails at present;" and also says, "this sin infects the very churches which shared most largely in the late revival," and, that "these alienations date back their origin, in most cases, to the very midst of that scene of awakening."

The Congregationalist says, this "evil is by no means confine to the Baptists. Our own columns have, perhaps, never borne so humiliating a record of contentious and ecclesiastical litigations as during the last few months."

We are not surprised at this result, when we consider that they have relapsed into sectarianism, and again conformed to the world, re-establishing their levees, pic-nics, fairs and festivals. They must either come out from the world and be separate, or float with it to destruction.

It seems clear, beyond a doubt, that the last day perils have fully come, and instead of looking for better times, they will "wax worse and worse."

☞ He that loses his conscience, has nothing left worth keeping.

Diary Leaves.

Monday evening, March 7th, we renewed our attack upon error, at the Town Hall in Castleton. Jan. 3d, we commenced a discussion at the same place, on the subject of Universal salvation, with H. P. Cutting, which continued three evenings, before large audiences. Since then, many of the people have been anxious to hear more upon the great truths of the Bible. We saw one who was convicted during the discussion, who has since been converted, and is now rejoicing in the Lord.

This evening, we endeavored to show from the word of the Lord, that sin and misery will finally end in the eternal destruction of the sinner, the devil, and all his angels. Those who heard were astonished at the amount of Scripture in favor of this point, and rejoiced to learn that God will not eternally torture his creatures and keep them forever wailing in "indescribable agonies." We have seldom seen a more attentive audience, one better qualified to judge of the truthfulness of our position. Men, who had long believed in the doctrine of eternal misery, saw that the Bible did not sustain this monstrous error, so dishonoring to the God of heaven, and so well calculated to make his creatures hate him. We believe Satan is very anxious to have this doctrine perpetuated on purpose to make us believe that our Creator is cruel and unmerciful in the extreme. Of all doctrines, ever forged by Satan, this seems to be the climax. We have not language to express our abhorrence of this monstrous opinion. And yet, as certain as that the soul is immortal, so certainly must the wicked be eternally miserable, unless all are saved.

Tuesday evening, we continued the subject, and many were still more astonished at the harmony of the Bible on this point. Although a preacher had said, the people were too well enlightened to believe our preaching, we found the opposite true, and those best informed in the Bible, were the first to see the truth. Many questions were asked, which helped us in clearing away the theological rubbish which had been piled upon the word of the Lord, so as nearly to hide it from the common people. We found the lovers of truth were half starved for the want of "the sincere milk of the word."

Wednesday evening, "the signs of the times" formed the subject of our discourse. We endeavored to show that we are truly in "the time of the end," and that we may soon, very soon, expect to see Jesus coming in the clouds of heaven, to gather his loved ones and establish them forever in their peaceful home. We see no room for doubts on this point. Our faith is unwavering.

Thursday evening, we spoke on the cause of the spiritual manifestations that have been witnessed, more or less, since the time Satan first addressed Eve in the garden of paradise. We believe departed human spirits have nothing to do with it, and that it is utterly impossible for any part of a dead man to make a communication.

Friday evening, the subject was continued, when we examined the morals and doctrines of Spiritualism, showing that the claim, made by Spiritualists, that "it is ancient christianity revived," is as far from the truth, as it would be to call darkness light, or the Lord the devil. We had only to read their own productions to show that there was not the least particle of affinity between the two.

Saturday evening, we spoke, by request, on the resurrection of the dead, showing that the Bible teaches the literal resurrection of the material organism, called man, and that if there is no resurrection of the dead, then there is no hope of their future conscious existence.

Although the traveling was bad, we had large, intelligent, and very attentive audiences every evening. The people urged us to stay longer, but we were obliged to leave for our appointment at Rutland. Many of the prominent citizens of Castleton became deeply interested, and were astonished at the plain harmony of Bible truth. We expect to hear good tidings from that place.

Rutland. We spent Lord's day, 13th, with the church in this place, which is in a prosperous condition. Five joined the covenant, resolved to take the Bible as their only rule of faith and practice. Several in other churches are embracing the doctrine of the sleep of the dead, the destruction of the wicked, and the other great truths of the Bible which have lain for centuries buried in obscurity. Our Bro. in this place have purchased a pleasant building lot for a church, on which they intend to erect a convenient house of worship. The cause of Christ is advancing in all this region.

Monday, returned home to Boston, and attended an excellent prayer meeting at our office. A number have become interested in our meetings at Chapman Hall during the winter, under the preaching of Bro. Burnham, who are turning from popular fables to the truth of the Bible. A very intelligent class of hearers fill our place of worship from week to week, who seem anxious to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

A Wise Saying.—They are the best christians who are more careful to reform themselves than to censure others.

☞ We refer our preaching brethren to a notice on page 3d of a new house for divine worship in Concord, N. H.

It was sent in the first of the month, but having been mislaid, has been delayed till now.

"Eternal Misery of Hell."

The above is the heading of Tract, No. 277, of the American Tract Society,—author, Jas. Saurin. The following is an extract from it. While it is perused, let the reader remember, that Paul says, "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance," and ask himself if the "eternal misery of hell" shows "the goodness of God?" We can see, very clearly, the goodness of God in the destruction of the wicked—in putting miserable beings out of misery, and causing them to become "extinct," but we utterly fail in seeing a single trace of goodness manifested in keeping them alive eternally to torture them. Mr. Saurin says:

"As God will aggravate the sufferings of the damned by displaying his glorious attributes, their hatred of him will be unbounded—their torment will excite their hatred—their hatred will aggravate their torment. Is not this the height of misery? To be filled with unmixed hate toward the Perfect Being, the Supreme Being, the Sovereign Beauty—in a word, to hate the infinite God! Doth not this idea present to your mind a state the most melancholy, the most miserable? One chief excellence of the glory of happy spirits is a consummate love to their Creator. One of the most horrid punishments of hell is the exclusion of divine love. O miserable state of the damned! In it they utter as many blasphemies against God as the happy souls in heaven shout alleluiahs to his praise.

These are the punishments of condemned souls. It remains only that we consider the LENGTH AND DURATION of them. But can we number the innumerable, and measure that which is beyond all mensuration? Can we make you comprehend the incomprehensible? and shall we amuse you with our imaginations?

For my part, when I endeavor to represent eternity to myself, I avail myself of whatever I conceive most long and durable. I heap imagination on imagination, conjecture on conjecture. First, I consider those long lives which all men wish, and some attain; I observe those old men who lived four or five generations, and who alone make the history of an age; I do more—I turn to ancient chronicles—I go back to the patriarchal age, and consider a life extending through a thousand years; and I say to myself, All this is not eternity—all this is only a point in comparison of eternity.

Having represented to myself real objects, I form ideas of imaginary ones; I go from our age to the time of publishing the Gospel; from thence to the publication of the law—from the law to the flood, from the flood to the creation; I join this epoch to the present time, and I imagine Adam yet living. Had Adam lived till now, and had he lived in misery—had he passed all his time in fire, or on a rack—what idea must we form of his condition? At what price would we agree to expose ourselves to misery so great? What imperial glory would appear glorious, were it followed by so much wo? Yet this is not eternity—all this is nothing in comparison of eternity.

I go further still: I proceed from imagination to imagination, from one supposition to another; I take the greatest number of years that can be imagined; I add ages to ages, millions of ages to millions of ages; I form of all these one fixed number, and I stay my imagination. After this, I suppose God to create a world like this which we inhabit; I suppose him creating it, by forming one atom after another, and employing in the production of each atom the time fixed in my calculation just now mentioned. What numberless ages would the creation of such a world in such a manner require! Then I suppose the Creator to arrange these atoms, and to pursue the same plan of arranging them as of creating them. What numberless ages would such an arrangement require! Finally, I suppose him to dissolve and annihilate the whole, and observing the same method in this dissolution as he observed in the creation and disposition of the whole. What an immense duration would be consumed! Yet this is not eternity—all this is only a point in comparison of eternity.

Associate now all these suppositions, and of all these periods make one fixed period; multiply it again, and suppose yourself to pass in multiplying it a time equal to that which the period contains: it is literally and strictly true, all this is not eternity—all this is only a point in comparison of eternity.

Ah me! one night passed in a burning fever, or in struggling in the waves of the sea between life and death, appears of immense length! It seems to the sufferer as if the sun had forgot its course, and as if the laws of nature itself were subverted. What then will be the state of those miserable victims of divine displeasure, who, after they shall have passed through the ages we have been describing, will be obliged to make this overwhelming reflection: All this is only an atom of our misery! What will their despair be, when they shall be forced to say to themselves: Again we must revolve through those enormous periods—again we must suffer a privation of celestial happiness—devouring flames again—cruel remorse again—crimes and blasphemies over and over again! For ever, for ever! Ah! how severe is this word, even in this life! How great is a misfortune, when it is incapable of relief!—how insupportable, when we are obliged to add for ever to it! These irons for ever! these chains for ever! this prison for ever! this universal contempt for ever! this domestic trouble for ever! Poor mortals! how short-sighted are you to call sorrows eternal, which end with your lives! What! this life!—this life, that passeth with the rapidity of a weaver's shuttle!—this life, which vanisheth like a sleep! Is this what you call for ever? Ah! absorbing periods of eternity—accumulated myriads of ages—these, if I may be allowed to speak so—these will be FOR EVER of the damned!"

Protestantism in Europe.

The following sad picture of Protestantism is from a devoted minister of Christ in Torquay, Eng. Many begin to see that we have really come to the last day perils, of which the apostle speaks. The writer says:

"It has at last become evident, even to the most thoughtless, that some great catastrophe is at hand, and that some heavy judgment is hanging over Christendom . . . How is the gold become dim! Every thing in confusion—every thing threatening! All nations preparing for war!—and not only war, but revolution! . . . The world is rushing headlong into a tremendous revolution, and falling directly under the judgments of God! Such is our state; and the true cause is—THE EXTINCTION OF CHRISTIANITY. 'Because THOU ART LUKEWARM, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth.' (Rev. 3d.) APOSTACY is the cause, and destruction is the END. . . . Wherever we look, nothing is to be seen but the ruins of christian truth. Christianity, like some ruined temple, lies scattered here and there. Its sheltering walls are overthrown—its symmetry destroyed. No man flies to it for defence from the cruelty of the world—no man finds an asylum within its gates—no man looks any more on its beautiful proportions, as a model for the construction of his life. The broken columns,—the cornices,—the hewn stones,—lie here and there, and each man may find a fragment useful for his purpose, and precious in itself; but you will search in vain for any shelter for the multitude—for any spot where nations may meet together, or 'dwell together in unity.'"

In speaking of the English nation, he says:—"We have blown christianity to pieces, as we did the wretched people of India, after we had first driven them to insurrection by ages of cruelty; and we believe that, at this moment, christianity has become absolutely EXTINCT.

If you will not take this upon trust, you may find it proved by undeniable facts. . . . The world looked on and sneered at the hypocrisy which sent out missionaries and Bibles, cut a road for them with the sword, and built it up with mangled limbs, torn to pieces with artillery. By these unholy deeds,—by the abject silence of our clergy, we have . . . taught the rest of mankind that christianity is a jest—a loose garment to be put on for ornament in time of peace, and to be thrown aside the moment we can gain any thing by war. Such a christianity has long enveloped the nation at large; and the clergy, by their abject silence, have adopted it for their own. . . .

We believe that Protestantism has been put on its trial before God and man. It had long been corrupt, and worldly to the heart's core. It had worshiped money, and rank, and worldly prosperity. It had fallen away from all the simplicity of Christ. And yet it had dared to pour its abuse upon the church of Rome, which was certainly as bad; but could hardly have been worse. Both are equally APOSTATES—one being an apostate church worshiping SAINTS,—the other, an apostate church worshiping MONEY . . . The conduct of our clergy has been, more especially, discreditable. Zealous in trifles; indifferent in great things. Zealous where zeal was popular; tame and silent where zeal was disreputable. . . .

What shall we say to these things? That Protestantism has fallen into the idolatries of Paganism, and is become a worshiper of demons. . . .

Were fifty Luthers to arise at once, they could not revive it. Wretched, miserable, poor, blind, and naked; it thinks itself rich and in need of nothing; and self-conceit is an incurable disease. You can act upon vice, and rage, and revenge, but you can never act upon SELF-CONCEIT. We believe that Christendom is enervated beyond recovery."

"The Deadly Calm."

Says an English writer, who is closely watching the signs of the times:—

"A deadly calm hangs over the world, like a stagnant fog, or the stillness before a tropic storm—an awful SILENCE, like the silence before an execution. Men hold their breath as if the axe were raised, and the fatal blow about to be struck. Many seem indifferent; but no one is at ease. It is felt that something is at hand—that terrible SOMETHING—what will it be?"

We think the student of prophecy need not be at loss to know what "that terrible something" will be. All things proclaim the judgment near. Are we ready? Are we living so that the Lord will say to us, "well done?" Reader, if not ready, prepare at once!

Stagnation of Business.

The financial world rolls heavily. It has been vainly expected that business would have a resurrection long since, but, "alas! alas!" the money-making machinery is out of order some where. The word "perplexity" still expresses the feelings of our great commercial men. They puzzled their brains with business perplexities till sad disappointment is fairly stamped on their countenances. They know not what to do. The future presents to them no bright prospect. They begin to feel the force of the Scripture in Jas. 5: 1-3.

Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are motheaten. Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.

The following is from the Traveller, and shows the dull state of the shipping interest:

Shipbuilding in 1859.—It is said that so great is the surplus of American tonnage, that if a ship was not built in this country for three years, and the average annual losses by shipwreck, &c., occurred during that time, even then we should have tonnage enough for the business of the United States and for the foreign carrying trade. Ships now are the poorest property a man can own, for they sell at enormous expense, and almost nothing making money they are losing. Assessments instead of dividends are the present results of ship-owning, and the prospects in the future are very unfavorable. Our own ports, North and South, are full of ships,—also the Pacific and India and China ports. Our markets are full of goods, and we should not suffer if we did not receive an East India cargo for one year; neither would San Francisco suffer if treated in the same way. Let our shipbuilders cease, then; let not low wages, cheap timber and a want of something to do, tempt them to build this year. We had better be idle than lose what we have made, as all shipbuilders will this season. If they have nothing of their own, they will lose the property of those who credit them. Wait for better times.

Turkish Perplexities.

The "distress of nations" still rolls on, and we see no prospect of better times till Jesus returns to set up his kingdom. The storm-cloud still rises, and we may soon expect the tempest to pour in fury down upon the wicked hosts that inhabit this planet. The Gentiles, as well as Jews, have rejected the gospel of Christ, trampled his commandments under their feet, and turned from his truth to fables.

A Constantinople letter of the 8th of December, in the Nouvelliste of Marseilles, says:—

"A demonstration took place a few days ago, on the part of the persons who supply the palace, and whose accounts still remain unpaid. The Sultan was on his way from Top Hane, where he had breakfasted, to the palace of Doime Bakche, when he was met by an assemblage of nearly three hundred of these creditors, who crowded around the imperial cortege, calling for justice. The first movement of the Sultan, at finding himself surrounded by this crowd, who were uttering loud cries, was to lay hold of the hilt of his sabre; but soon discovering the pacific character of the demonstration, he ordered that three of the creditors should be delegated to call on Haki Bey, who should that very evening receive the necessary orders on the subject of claims. The following day three of the principal creditors waited on Haki Bey, who sent them to Rizza Pasha, the President of the commission formed for the settlement of the accounts of the civil list, which has held but one or two sittings, for form's sake. Rizza assured them that all their accounts should be paid, but that, at present, funds were wanting. Meantime, many of these unfortunate men, who were pressed by their own creditors, have been obliged to suspend payment, and several of them have been completely ruined. A similar demonstration was made two or three days after, by the workmen of the imperial buildings."

England and France.

The English begin to apprehend some danger from their French neighbors, who, though they profess to be friendly, are preparing for war on a grand scale. Close observers are satisfied that Napoleon III. is about to avenge the battle of Waterloo, where ended the military career of his uncle, Napoleon I.

Sir Charles Napier has addressed a letter to the Earl of Derby, in which he says:—

"In the present disturbed state of Europe, is it right, is it safe, that France, with an army of 500,000 men, should have the command of the channel? Between Brest and the Cherbourg there are thirteen or fourteen sail of the line (the half of Cherbourg,) either manned or ready to be manned, and France has the means of manning a fleet whhich we have not, and she may bring the crew of the Toulon fleet to Cherbourg by rail, but we cannot bring the crew of the Mediterranean fleet to Portsmouth by rail. Under these circumstances, I strongly recommend your lordship to call on the commission for manning the navy to make their report, and to order our first reserve to be manned and the second reserve to be prepared. Montalembert told us we had no friends in Europe, and what combinations may take place in the spring we do not know; and we ought not to forget that Russia has a large fleet in the Baltic always manned, and they are not far from our eastern coast. Do not forget, my lord, that Napoleon I. formed an army of reserve at Dijon, and was across the Alps before Austria was aware of it. Napoleon III. may cross the Channel before we know what we are about."

"My Priest Forbids."

Thus said an Irish boy at the Elliot school, in North Bennett street, Boston, a few days since, when desired to repeat the Lord's prayer and the ten commandments. From the following item of news, it may be seen that the "woman drunken with the blood of the saints," is acting, as if she was saying "in her heart, I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." But when we look at her present position, we think it will soon be said of her, this is that spoken by the mouth of the prophet, when he said,—"Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire; for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her."—Rev. 18: 7, 8.

Sectarian Interference in School Discipline.—At the opening of the Elliot School in North Bennett street, Monday, the 16th inst., as Mr. Samuel W. Mason, the master, was about to commence the session with the usual devotional exercises, it was apparent that a large portion of the school neglected to follow him in the offering of the "Lord's Prayer," and in the recitation of the Ten Commandments, which also composed a portion of the services, the same omission was apparent.

On the master ordering compliance with the rule of the school in this respect, the Irish portion of the scholars, who compose a large part of the school, flatly refused obedience, alleging that the Catholic priest in that section of the city had ordered them not to join in the offering of the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, or the singing of Old Hundred, or any other "Yankee songs." Under these circumstances the master ordered, in vain, a compliance with the regulations of the school, as the boys in a body adhered to the mandate of their priest. . . . The following is a correct account of the number who have left, and also of those who have returned:

Total number left, - - - -	381
Total number returned, - -	138
Number still out, - - - - -	243

Of the 381, 37 were taken out by their parents, to remain out, as they say, until the matter can be tested. There is a marked difference in regard to liberality of views in these Catholic parents. Some give cheerful consent that their children shall hear the Scriptures read, &c., while others utterly refuse to allow it. Said a fine lad of Irish descent to Mr. Mason, the teacher, "I wish to obey you, Mr. Mason, but my priest forbids." Others partake of the bigotry of their parents. A number have torn out the Ten Commandments from their books, and one of twelve years was seen in the act, as he left the school, of tearing up a Protestant Testament, and scattering the fragments about the streets.

We hear rumors of disturbances at other schools, but nothing of the character of the outbreak at the Elliot School has occurred.

Avoid It.

The following truthful propositions and just remarks, from the pen of Bro. Geo. Trask, of Fitchburg, deserve the candid and prayerful attention of all the professed followers of Christ. We are rejoiced to take our brother by the hand in his worthy efforts to show the tobacco user that he is cherishing a viper in his own bosom that will, ere long, strike its poison to the very vitals of his physical and moral health.

THE CHRISTIAN A SLAVE TO TOBACCO!

My Brother! I wish to show you that your habit is at war with religion, name and thing.

1. Religion bids you to be cleanly and gentlemanly in demeanor. But, tell me, is the common use of tobacco a cleanly and becoming practice? Snuff it, and it makes your nose a mere dust-pan; chew it, and it soils your lips and teeth, and makes your mouth a nauseous distillery; smoke it, and it pollutes flesh and breath, earth and air; makes the chest a sort of volcano, and the mouth a crater venting smoke and fire. Is this gentlemanly or decent? When Governeur Morris returned from France, a Doctor of Divinity, notorious as a smoker, said to him: "Mr. Morris, do gentlemen smoke in Paris?"—"Gentlemen," said Mr. Morris, "Gentlemen, doctor, smoke nowhere!"

2. Religion bids you crucify fleshly lusts, and exercise self-denial. Is not this a hurtful lust, a vile appetite, an unreasonable self-indulgence, totally at war with purity and self-denial? Says Dr. Harris, "Tobacco is a lust of the flesh, an agent of Satan, by which he is now destroying more bodies and souls than by any other agent." Said a good man, "My tobacco is a lust, which is getting the mastery of me; I will drop it, if it takes the flesh from my bones." He did so. Brother, I pray you do likewise.

3. Religion bids you, as a steward of God, to make a proper use of money. Your habit is expensive, and worse than useless. If you are well, this poison can do you no good; hence, every cent you spend for it is a waste which dishonors God; it is "money for that which is not bread." If you have used it for some time, a child can show you that you have squandered an enormous amount of money,—money needed to raise drooping hearts, and to fill the world with light and love.

4. Religion bids you to use time, strength and life to the best purpose. The Earl of Stanhope maintains that the victims of this narcotic spend one-twentieth part of their time,—two years of forty,—in its indulgence. What right have you, my brother, to waste years or months in this manner? Is this "redeeming the time?" What right have you to enfeeble your body by this emasculating drug, when its energies, in full force, should be given to God and the good of our perishing race? What right have you to use a drug whose tendency is completely ANTI-VITAL, and which may cut short your life ten years or twenty?

5. Religion bids you give the world a good example. It has been said that ninety-nine victims in a hundred acquire this infectious example. Be this as it may, the example of men in your position is unspeakably powerful and pernicious. It has power to sweep multitudes of young men down to death. "Father," said a little boy, "why do you chew tobacco?"—"Because I love it," was the reply. The son chewed it, learned to love it, and thus ruined his health, and embittered his whole life with disease. I saw a little boy, with a cigar, puffing like a steam-engine. "Why do you smoke?" I inquired. "Father smokes, and I'll smoke, sir," was the reply. The cry on every hand is, "Cure fathers, cure church-members, cure men of influence; when they drop it, we will 'follow suit.'"

6. Religion bids you to be a thorough temperance man. Rum and tobacco are twin demons. Tobacco creates an unnatural appetite, which craves alcoholic stimulants, and the gratification of this appetite leads to drunkenness. Smoke-shops and dram-shops, sots on rum and sots on tobacco, have usually been identical; and temperance can never triumph whilst tobacco intoxicates the million. Come, my brother! no longer declaim against alcohol whilst a slave to tobacco; no longer make yourself the song of the drunkard by intoxication on your quid or pipe.

7. Religion bids you to be pure and Christ-like. To use tobacco is defiling, is demoralizing: it is a heathenish abomination, and you cannot respect yourself as its victim. Do you think you please Christ by using it? Do you think Christ would have allowed John to lean on his bosom, had he used it? Do you think the apostles used it? Are you willing this should be written on your gravestone: "Here lies a Christian who cut short his life by the use of tobacco?" Is this epitaph becoming for a christian?

8. Religion bids you to be entirely devoted to God. The use of this pernicious drug forbids this. If you used it early, and have used it long, it has become with you the KING OF APPETITES. You love it better than honey, or milk, or bread, or wine, or the choicest fruits. It is usually the last thing which engages your heart at night, and it is among the first things which claim your fond regards in the morning. Birds may fill the air with music, flowers may load it with perfume, the sun may surpass himself in the beauty of his brightness; but you cannot enjoy the one or the other very much, nor God, their glorious author, till you have appeased a giant appetite, which has dominion over you. "Be not deceived," my brother. Think not that you love God with all your heart when this idol has supremacy in your soul. Talk not of aspirations "for holiness," "full assurance" and "sanctification," whilst a slave to this peculiar lust, or whilst your piety is so much raised or depressed by the narcotic power of this deceptive drug. Break, my brother, from such "bonds of iniquity." "Take hold," christian-like, and help us wake the CHURCH and wake the NATION to this great and fearful evil.

For the Crisis.

A Word to the Indifferent.

While taking a view of the present state of the cause, my heart is filled with deep sorrow in witnessing the spirit of almost profound indifference which pervades the minds of many. I am led to exclaim with a heart of sadness, my Lord, how can men professing godliness manifest such a spirit of lethargy, luke-warmness, and stupidity; while the last sands of time are running out, and they are hastening to the solemn realities of that great day of retribution? It is true that many, like the apostate Jews, honor God with their mouths, while their hearts are far removed from him; and they continue to talk about the coming day; but O, where is the corresponding practical part? Visit the place of prayer, and how often will you find them there? or if, peradventure, they are present, they act as though they had neither part nor lot in the matter; and how foreign is their every day deportment.

O thou indifferent soul, arouse thee from this awful spell of indifference, before the solemn trump of God, a thousand times louder than the loudest thunders combined, with astonishing terror shall fall upon thine ear, and pierce thy soul with bitter anguish and hopeless remorse. Arouse thee, thou careless one, and work out thy soul's salvation with fear and trembling, while salvation is proffered to you upon the free and easy terms of the gospel; for thine everlasting welfare and eternal destination turns upon the wise improvement of the present rapidly fleeting moments of our probation. Why dost thou remain so secure, and at ease, while the great day of God Almighty is liable to burst upon thee at any moment? Thou art closing thine eyes to thy best interests, and turning thy back upon thy best friend. Art thou willing to be captivated by the shrewd devices of the great deceiver, and be ensnared, degree by degree, almost unperceived, until thou art emphatically clad with a thick garment of intolerable indifference, and impenetrable stupor? Canst thou, since once having tasted of the sweets of redeeming love, now consent to be allured away from the cause of thy dear Redeemer, by the deceptive charms of this transitory world? Canst thou now consent to be blindfolded by that arch deceiver, and willingly stray from the pleasant paths of peace, and wander from the fold of Christ, and content thyself in sipping from the detestable cup of sensual pleasure, vain recreation and earthly amusements?

O thou cold-hearted, drowsy, lukewarm professor, if thou hast one lingering desire to obtain a passport into that kingdom of joy and peace, for your own sake, make no delay in speedily retracing your steps, and delight again in the service of thy Master. At once adopt, and through life carry into effect, the resolution that you will henceforth absent yourself from the contaminating influence of this God-hating, piety-depressing world. Stand aloof from the very appearance of evil; shun the unhallowed influences which are extant in the land, and floating upon every popular breeze, and live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present evil world, ever looking for that blessed hope—the glorious appearing of the great Deliverer.

But a short time since, we were all on the wing for the kingdom. But what a lamentable change has come over us. The world's allurements have induced many to go back to its weak and beggarly elements, who have plunged into formality, and are unprepared to meet the Savior, not being found in possession of the Spirit. But, thank God, there are still a few sighing ones, who are waiting for deliverance. There are a few who are longing for the coming kingdom, and the theme of their soul, and the burden of their prayer is, come, Lord Jesus. As the true-hearted saint gazes upon the thickening perils, as they rapidly increase, with the genuine, unadulterated love of God burning in his soul, he breathes out the heartfelt petition, with devotional ardor, and intense fervor—"Thy kingdom come!" Soon this oft-repeated petition will be answered to the joy of the humble, persevering few; and our King in his beauty will come to gather his waiting church.

☞ It is a popular belief with mothers, that washing young children daily in cold water makes them hardy. This is a grave mistake; the feeble circulation of a child requires the aid and assistance of warm water and warm clothing. The greatest medical man who ever lived—John Hunter—recommended three rules for the management of children, and they express the substance of a volume; he says:—"Give them plenty of milk, plenty of sleep, and plenty of flannel."

Letters.

Letters! letters! what is to be done with all the letters? Pocket full, trunk full, drawer full—and still they come. Too good to burn, but put them into the big drawer, and they are buried—as well be burnt as buried alive. But I cant make up my mind to burn or bury them. Some must be kept. Business demands their preservation. Then here are others written by hands that now shall write no more. They tell us of "Friends that are scattered, like roses in bloom."

We must keep these letters. Then there are letters that touch our hearts. Here is one that comes from a poor convict in State prison, and tells us how he has found the Lord. Another from one who tells how he has been led to learn the gospel of Christ from some straggling tract. Another, that had $5 in it, "from one who loves to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ;" but who it was, was long a mystery. Another, from a distant and unknown pilgrim, containing words of cheer in hours of darkness, like water to a thirsty soul. Another, from a poor sad invalid, longing for rest where sickness comes no more. Another, yes two, with money to scatter tracts with, only three initials appended. The name is unknown, but the handwriting is remembered, and the little odd gold piece that came in it. Another, from a far-off preacher, which tells of poor health, three or four-year-old-coats, hard times and brave hearts. Another, from some sad soul, that just begins to bow beneath the burden of the word of the Lord, and stretches out a hand for sympathy, crying, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Another, from one who, anointed and blest in labor by the great Master of Assemblies, yet timorous and doubtful, writes, "May I preach?" Another, from a doubting, heavy-laden soul, saying, "What must I do to be saved?"

Now here are lots of letters, too numerous to mention; but what shall be done with the letters? How can I keep them, and keep them so that I can read them, without burying them and digging them up? Well, I've just received an article that seems to work well. It is Smith and Butler's "Letter and Music File." It is just like a book, made of different sizes—letter size, foolscap size, sheet music size, etc. It has 250 leaves in it, each about an inch long. One side of each short leaf is covered with gum arabic. When you get a letter just moisten the edge of the leaf, and then lay the letter on, and it will stick and lie open just like a leaf to a book. So you can put in 250 letters, and then there is an index at the end, so that you can page the letters and index them; and then, instead of an ugly pack of letters to open and look over, scattering them all around, you can open your book, look at the index, and turn at once to the letter you wish to see.

Asa L. Shipman is the manufacturer of this convenient article, and George W. Young, 138 William street, New York, is the general agent for their sale. The price is $1 each. Bro. Young is agent for H. L. Hastings' books and tracts in N. Y., and will be glad at any time to see Brn. and friends who may wish for books and tracts at publishers' prices, or for his letter files. Give him a call. Persons ordering books of H. L. H. in N. Y., can have letter files sent in the bundle if they wish, and will send the pay for them.

QUESTION.—Is there any event to mark the ending of the 1290 years,—Dan. 12: 11,—this side of 1815? If not, must not the 1335 days or years end in 1860? Will some brother answer through the Crisis?

W. F. HIGGINS.

Death.

Thou hast been called the King of Terrors long,
With some 'tis so, but 'tis not in the song;
The christian looks undaunted o'er thy wave,
And fears not e'en its passage through the grave:
Anchored within the veil, firm as a rock,
His faith can meet thy rudest, boldest shock.
Thine is the port where all as equals meet,
Sheltered from sorrow's withering noon-tide heat;
Then why, O Death! should we not meet as friends,
Since every step in life to thee more nearly tends?
Who often think on death, must hear the knell
Without alarm, for they must needs die well:
O, I would lay me down with thee to rest,
As safely as when on my mother's breast;
Why should we tremble to lay down a life
Fleck'd with so much of toil, and pain, and strife?
The mourner lays his burden down with thee,
From life's uncounted pains and sorrows free.
Death is the crown of life! immortal joys
The christian's mind alone in death employs;
Were death denied, how vain it were to live,
How valueless were all that life can give:
'Tis through thy portal gates we reach that bourn,
Where, in soft slumber, man forgets to mourn.
O Death! our friend, the kindest and the best,
Toil-worn and tempest tost, with thee is rest;
Thou giv'st the sorrow laden sweet release,
The trodden down of earth, from toil surcease!
O, if the soul was here confined to share
For aye its pains and sorrows, toil and care,
This earth would be a wilder'd scene of woe,
And blighted hope mankind would only know,
And while the tide of years should onward roll,
His withered hopes of Heaven would mock control;
His nerve'ess soul would cease with hope to burn,
And back to kindred dust mourn to return;
Puissant man would sigh for thee, O death!
Would pant to render up to thee his breath;
When first transgression blighted this fair earth,
Through thee, the blissful dream of Heaven had birth,
And if thou should'st be banished from this sphere,
Man's sojourn would be hopeless, hapless here;
Then, Death, we'll welcome thee, our best of friends,
Life's toilsome journey through thy portal ends.
O, had my muse the power to deck the tomb,
And make perpetual roses round it bloom,
I'd cull the brightest gems from Eden's bowers,
And wreathe it with a coronal of flowers.

Correspondence.

From M. L. Pratt.

BELOVED CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:—I love the truth, it is the christian's hope. Says the beloved apostle: "He that hath this hope, purifieth himself, even as he is pure." —"If in this life only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable." It was for the hope of the resurrection that Paul was bound with chains. But how little do we hear the christian's hope preached in these days of fables, by those professing to be watchmen on the walls of Zion. The coming of Christ and the resurrection of the dead were the burden of the apostles' preaching, exhortation to prayer, and the great incentive held forth to holiness of heart, and to induce men to repent, "Because God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world."

I am a firm believer in the doctrine of immortality only through Christ. What beauty and harmony adorn the sacred page when we are willing to let God mean what he says. Let us believe God. He makes all future life depend upon a resurrection; for without a resurrection, even those who fall asleep in Jesus are perished. God's word declares it; and who dare deny it? How consistent is God's word from beginning to end! Strange that mortal man should pretend to claim what God alone possesses in himself—Immortality. Christ has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel, and to those who by patient continuance in well doing seek for it, shall obtain it at the resurrection; those who sow to the flesh shall reap corruption —shall die the second death. Not a word does the Bible teach about sinners suffering eternal torment; not one plain passage can be brought to sustain this horrible doctrine, which mars the character of God with injustice. His word is glorious as his character.

If this should fall into the hands of any who are strangers to this blessed hope, the hope of seeing Jesus as he is, and being made like him, let me entreat you as you value eternal life, not to trifle with the truth of God. He spake as never man spake and he cannot lie; for he has said, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away;" not one jot or tittle shall fail. Sinner! the word of God will stand, and all your opposition and prejudices cannot overthrow it. The truth is destined to prevail; then yield to its mild sway, and not be found fighting against God.

Vineland, Wis.

From Bro. S——.

BRO. GRANT:—I would respond to your request, that every subscriber should furnish at least another, to extend the truth, and help bear the extra expense of enlarging our family paper. I am so glad you have thought best to enlarge the paper, I hardly know how to find words to express my gratitude to God for having put it into your hearts thus to do. The "Crisis" comes nearer to my beau ideal of what such a paper ought to be, than any other paper ever published amongst us. I look upon the Crisis as peculiarly "Our Family paper."

Now, brethren, let us take hold and sustain "Our Paper," so that it shall be perfectly above board, and never be compelled to occupy its pages in dunning.

We have enjoyed a refreshing from the presence of the Lord here, and a goodly number, we trust, have been truly converted to God. Yours in the blessed hope.

Oxford, Ill.

From J. Baker.

BRO. GRANT:—I am yet longing for that "rest that remaineth for the people of God,"—the land that shall know no sorrow, nor sighing, pain nor death. I am a pilgrim still, and hope to meet the dear saints of God at the gathering time, never to part again. I love the coming and kingdom of Christ better than any thing else; and long to see Jesus coming in the clouds of heaven, attended with the angelic host, to gather the faithful flock of God, and bring them to the land of rest. Then shall the "ransomed of the Lord return and come to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

"I long to be there, and the thought that 'tis near,
Makes me almost impatient for Christ to appear,
And fit up that dwelling of glories so rare,
The kingdom of Jesus, I long to be there."

Brn. and Srs., is there not enough in the future to stimulate us to bear the consecrated cross; to put up with all the conflicts of this mortal life? We think there is. Let us face the storm with new energy, and do good as we have opportunity.

BRO. GRANT:—Bro. Taylor's fence riding is tipping off many into the dead Hades. We think if he continues his articles on fence riding, he will soon get the fence clear, and it is not impossible, when he steps off, many will even jump over the fence who have long been on the other side.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

PER STEAMSHIP CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The advices are four days later than by the Arabia.

It is explained that the ground for supposing the French and Austrians will evacuate the Papal States, is because the Pope has invited them to do so. Nothing had transpired to indicate how either power will proceed, but rumors from Paris say the French will withdraw.

War preparations continued actively, and the Funds, which were so buoyant on the departure of the Arabia, had become depressed.

The war fever was high in Germany.

Late news from Brazil says that President Lopez of Paraguay had accepted the mediation of the Brazilian government in the difficulty with the United States.

FRANCE.

The anticipations of a peaceful solution of the existing difficulties which prevailed in England at the departure of the Arabia, do not appear to have been participated in to any extent in France, or in other parts of Europe where rumors of a warlike nature continued to prevail.

Large bodies of troops from Algiers continue to be landed at Marseilles. Sixteen batteries of artillery had likewise arrived at Marseilles.

Each regiment of artillery in the French service was to be increased by two batteries.

It is stated that the accumulation of military stores and provisions at Marseilles was greater than at any period during the Crimean war. The extensive warehouses at the Port of Joliette were crammed with military stores, and in the bake houses they were making biscuits night and day.

It was reported in military circles that three divisions of the army of Paris are forthwith to march to Lyons.

In commercial circles, the uneasiness caused by the immense preparations for war was on the increase, and it was feared that unless news decidedly favorable to peace transpired by the first of March, serious failures would occur.

ITALY.

Preparations were making on a large scale for the defence of Genoa and the Gulf of Spezzia.

At Milan, owing to popular demonstrations at Signor Dandolo's funeral, numerous arrests and domiciliary visits had been made. The prisoners were delivered over to a military commission. The funeral in question is said to have been attended by from ten to fifteen thousand people, and the air resounded with shouts of "Viva l'Italia," "Non l'Independenza."

The Genoa Gazette announces that a collision had taken place between some Modenese soldiers and Sardinian peasants, in the neighborhood of Sarzana. The soldiers pulled down a tri-colored flag, which was hoisted on the frontier, and trampled it under foot. The following day, two hundred Modenese soldiers, with two pieces of cannon, made a demonstration on the frontier, and again removed the flag, which had been re-hoisted. The peasants then assembled with arms, and some shots were fired on each side.

AUSTRIA.

Lord Cowley arrived at Vienna on the 27th Feb., and a telegraphic despatch from that city says that Prince Frederick William of Prussia was expected to arrive there on a special mission from Berlin. Lord Cowley presented his credentials on the 28th.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times states that the people were so disgusted with the policy of the Emperor Napoleon, that they loudly expressed a hope for war in order to end the present suspense.

GERMANY.

Thirty-nine members of the Wurtemberg Chamber had issued a strong address representing that the armaments in France were made with a view of establishing vassal States for the Napoleon dynasty. This is the view entertained generally by the German radicals. Unless the Emperor abandons his war projects, it is asserted that the German sovereigns will have no chance but to form a coalition against him.

PER STEAMER WESER.—Liverpool advices of the 5th.

FRANCE.

Preparations were being made for the arrival in France of some distinguished personage, and it is hinted that it might be the Pope.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that in a recent interview between the Papal Nuncio and M. Walewski, the latter, who is opposed to war, commented so pointedly on the obstinacy of the Pontifical government in refusing the concessions so much required by its subjects, that the Nuncio asked whether it was meant to compel him to demand his passports. Walewski replied—No, but this was not the time to disguise truth.

A Marseilles despatch says Russia has 60,000 troops on the Pruth, and has augmented her army in Georgia.

SARDINIA.

Austrian troops at Placenza are increasing daily. Twelve thousand had been placed on a war footing since the first of March.

AUSTRIA.

The Cabinet at Vienna have agreed to maintain 150,000 men in Lombardy, and will erect fortifications in all directions.

It is reported that Arch Duke Albrechdt and Baron Hess have been made Marshals.

The lower classes of Vienna are becoming exceedingly favorable to war.

The government is said to have contracted with the Lombardo Venetian Railway for the transport of 75,000 men during March.

The official Vienna Gazette says as soon as a notification in writing from Cardinal Antonelli arrives here, it is understood that the evacuation of the States of the Church by the Austrian troops will follow.

It is said that Austria will grant foreign vessels the privilege of navigating the Danube.

The Austrian army in Italy has been placed on a war footing.

The "News" thus discusses the great European question:

We hear that the Holy Father is anxious to get rid of Austrian and French occupation, even at the risk of being relegated by his diocese to Jerusalem, with a permit from the Sultan and the Czar. We hear, too, that Austria is disposed to retire within the limits assigned to her by the letter of treaties, and to relax her grasp of Central Italy. We hear all this and more that is equally credible to a credulous public. But what if it be too late? What if France, in other words, the French Emperor, means war; if his divisions, his transports, his guns, his commissariat are ready; if his army has its line of March, and is "straining in the slips;" if he himself is burning to take the field? What if he is under positive engagements to the King of Piedmont and to Count Cavour; and the united national party throughout Italy is waiting for the word to rise, and deliver Italy from the stranger? Talk of treaties to a man who reigns in their despite, and who proclaims that in those treaties the nations had no voice, and that their day is come. As well bind a tiger with a wisp of straw. England desires peace, and will keep it; but while she holds her own inviolably, she is not obliged to prevent any other nation from working out its own redemption, or to restrain the madness of irresponsible power from rushing on its fate.

CHILI.

Valparaiso dates are to Jan. 21. The revolutionary movement progresses. The provinces of Talca in the south, and Huasco and Copiapo in the north, are in arms against the government. Troops have been sent to meet the insurgents.

An attempt at revolution in the provinces of Nuble and Aconagua have been frustrated by the seizure of several of the agitators.

The Commercio, a journal favorable to the government, speaks of the revolutionary movements with contempt, and says tranquillity is certain. Other authorities say the revolution daily gains ground, and trouble was daily expected at Valparaiso, where great fears of excesses by the mob are entertained.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Clarksburg, Mass., Jan. 10th, 1859, Sr. KINGSBURY, aged forty-three years and ten months, wife of Bro. Amos Kingsbury.

Sr. Kingsbury died as she lived—a christian. She obtained hope in Christ when a youth; united with the Reformed Methodist church, with whom she lived many years an exemplary christian; but when the proclamation was made in 1854 that the children of God were then to receive their inheritance by the personal coming of the Son of God to raise those that have fallen asleep in him, and to change the living saints, she left all and embraced the welcome news; consequently she was among the disappointed ones. Nevertheless, her faith held out firm to the end. Sermon on the occasion by the writer. Sr. K. left a kind husband and only son to mourn their loss. May they so live that they may meet an unbroken family in the kingdom of God.

ISAAC BLANCHARD.

Died, in Hallowell, Me., March 5th, 1859, RICHARD, only son of Widow M. Bean.

His disease was congestive typhus. After he had been sick a few days, he called on his mother to pray for him, also two of his aunts who were present. He also prayed for himself. The Lord spoke peace to him; and a clearer case of conversion I never saw. He called each member of the family three times, and obtained the promise from each to meet him in the kingdom. Notwithstanding his pressure for breath, he shouted the high praises of God, and told his mother he should walk the golden streets with her in white. He wanted all he saw to be good. Since his death, a reformation has broke out in the mill where he worked. Ten or fifteen have been converted to the Lord.

N. SMITH.

Died, in Ellsworth, Me., Feb. 8th, 1859, of consumption, WILLIAM S. GRIFFIN, aged forty-one years and three months.

He was a firm believer in the soon coming of Christ to raise the dead and give life and immortality to all that love his appearing. Many near and dear friends stood around his bed at the last, whom he exhorted to prepare to meet him on the resurrection morning. He was calm and patient to the end, and such a heavenly smile as beamed on his features no mortal ever saw before.

This is the third time we have been called to mourn over our departed friends within three months and eight days. But we sorrow not as those that are without hope. Funeral services by Bro. Benjamin Smith.

"Dearest husband, thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that has bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

R. S. GRIFFIN.

Notices, &c.

Notice.

There has been recently fitted up in this city a small but convenient house of worship, situated on Warren street, two doors below my residence, which is on the corner of Rumford and Warren streets. The house is open and free, without distinction of party, for all the servants of Jesus Christ who are now publishing the glad tidings of the soon coming kingdom. We are few in number and limited in means; but would say to any, and to all, who feel the cause of God at heart, and are willing to sacrifice for the same, that here is an open door.

JONAS MERRIAM.

Concord, N. H., Feb 28th, 1859.

To Minnesota Brethren.

1st. Those who wish visits from me, will bear in mind that my expenses to and fro must be defrayed by those who send, as I am unable to "go a warfare at my own charges"

2d. Let those who send for tracts, remember to enclose enough to PAY POSTAGE on them. "Man's Future State" and the "Key of Truth" will still be sent to those who wish to scatter them.

3d. Shall we have a campmeeting in Minnesota this year? It will cost something, as I should wish to invite some able minister from the East; hence, I am unwilling to appoint one until I know whether it can be fully sustained. Will brethren all drop me a line, expressing their minds upon the point. When and where shall it be, if at all? Spring or fall? Somewhere near the Mississippi river?

W. SHELDON.

P. S.—Iowa and Wisconsin brethren, who live convenient to the river, will please let me know, by letter, whether they will help. The fare between St. Paul and Dubuque this season is reduced to $6 cabin and $2 deck. A campmeeting in Southern Minnesota would as well accommodate brethren in Iowa and Wisconsin as those in this State, and be accessible to a portion of those in Ill.

For the Crisis.

The Christian Soldier; or, True Patriotism.

A DISCOURSE.—BY WM. SHEPHERD.

"Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life: that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier."—2 Tim. 2: 3, 4.

(Concluded.)

Thirdly. In the first place, then, Jehovah has promised to this patriotic host in the outset thus,—"No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper, and every tongue that shall rise up in judgment thou shalt condemn." "Behold they (the wicked) shall surely gather together, but not by me; whosoever shall gather together shall fall for this sake." "But the wind shall carry them away, vanity shall take them; but he that putteth his trust in me shall possess the land and inherit my holy mountain."—Isa. 57: 13. This language is very conclusive. Let David speak for them, and let us notice how the enemy (when he shall come in like a flood) is to be conquered, and how the Spirit of the Lord is to raise up a standard against him.—"All nations compassed me about; but in the name of the Lord (that name we read of in Revelations, his apocalyptic name, which is soon to be developed, at the angelic annunciation of which every knee will be constrained to bow, and every tongue confess, that Jesus is the Christ to the glory of God the Father, destined to reign over all nations in the final redemption of the world;) I will destroy them. They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched like the fire of thorns; for in the name of the Lord I will destroy them."—Ps. 118: 10–12. "Though an host should encamp against me, mine heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident." "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion which cannot be removed, but abideth forever." Hence, "He shall subdue the people under me, and the nations under our feet." "For the Lord is strong, the Lord mighty in battle, who goeth out before our armies, and whose arrows are sharp in the hearts of the king's enemies whereby the people fall under thee." Again, he speaks of his activity and fleetness through divine aid thus: "For by thee I have run through a troop; and by my God have I leaped over a wall. . . It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh my way perfect. . . He teacheth my hands to war, ... so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation, and thy right hand hath holden me up, and thy gentleness hath made me great. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet did not slip. I have pursued mine enemies and overtaken them, neither did I turn again until they were consumed. I have wounded them that they were not able to rise, they are fallen under my feet. Thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle. Thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me. Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me."—Ps. 18.

This, you will observe, is prophetic and will be fulfilled in the coming day, when the greater David, he of glorious destiny, spoken by all the holy prophets and apostles, will be revealed from heaven to ascend the throne and sway his sceptre "from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth;" when one shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight; when even a little one shall be equal to a thousand, and a small one a strong nation; for it is then that the chariots of God will exceed twenty thousand, even thousands of angels. The Lord shall be among them as in Sinai, the holy place. He will then go forth as in the day of battle, and will overturn with his invincible army all that dare fight against Mount Zion, his dwelling-place, the place which he has chosen for his permanent rest, (Ps. 129: 5; 132: 13, 14,) upon which his feet shall in that day stand, (Zech. 14: 4,) and according to abundant prophetic testimony, the utter defeat of the wicked confederacy will be certain. For the Lord God will be seen over them in the ample display of his terrible majesty and power, and his arrows shall go forth as the lightnings, and the Lord of hosts shall blow the trumpet and shall move forth as the devastating whirlwinds of the south.

The name of the Lord, of which David speaks, whereby he is enabled to perform those many exploits, is synonymous with Jeremiah's battle axe, which he addresses thus: "Thou art my battle axe and weapons of war; for with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms, with thee will I break in pieces the horse and his rider . . . the chariot and his rider, captains and rulers," etc. Jer. 51: 20. Between the effects of this battle axe and the sword of the Spirit, you will find that there is a striking similarity.

Again, this assurance of the prophet is ratified in the Apocalyptic promise, as we find—"He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers, even as I received of my Father."—Rev. 2: 26, 27. But that he will ultimately triumph, the sublime visions of this wonderful book clearly indicate. Here we have the mighty armies of earth and heaven brought to view in dread array; we learn here that the rebel myriads of this world make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb overcomes them, for he is the LORD OF LORDS AND THE KING OF KINGS, and they that are with him are CALLED, and CHOSEN, and FAITHFUL.—Rev. 17: 14. Mark these three particular characteristics of a good soldier of Jesus Christ, namely; "CALLED and CHOSEN and FAITHFUL."

Again, the Revelator sees the final conflict in a more grand and warlike attitude, and describes the soldiers of Christ as mounted upon snow-white horses (denoting the holiness and purity of the war in which they are engaged) beautifully caparisoned, which he styles the "armies of heaven;" while the great object of attraction—their mighty Chief and Leader, the Son of God—is seen mounted upon a white charger, being himself called the FAITHFUL and TRUE, who in righteousness doth judge and MAKE war; he is clad as it were in vestments dipped in blood, while out of his mouth proceedeth a sharp sword, with which he doth smite the nations. And the beast and the kings of the earth are observed gathered together to also make war against him that sits on the horse and against his army. The result of this great battle is fully told by the mighty cry of the angel represented as standing in the sun, "Saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God. That ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of horses, and them that sit upon them, and the flesh of all men, both bond and free, both small and great."—Rev. 19: 11–21.

> "Thy saints in all this glorious war
> Shall conquer though they die,
> They see the triumph from afar,
> By faith they bring it nigh.
>
> When that illustrious day shall come,
> And all thy armies shine,
> In robes of victory through the skies,
> The glory shall be thine."

And here in conclusion under this head, it may be as well to observe, that in some heated conflicts he may betimes apprehend a defeat, and from seeing the apparent odds against him, feel disposed occasionally to make a hasty retreat; but this is only for want of due and careful consideration, or recalling to memory "whatsoever was written aforetime;" in calling to mind, for example, such exhortations as the following; "Be strong and courageous, be not afraid nor dismayed for the King of Assyria, nor for all the multitude that is with him; for there be more with us than with him, with him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God to help us and to fight our battles."—2 Chron. 32: 7, 8. We see a fair illustration of this in the case of Elisha and his servant, when at Dotham, where the king of Assyria and his numerous army encamped around them, that there seemed no possible way of escape. The servant became terribly alarmed for his safety, being hedged in on every side, both with horses and chariots of the enemy, and says to Elisha, "Alas, my master, what shall we do? And he answered, Fear not, for they that be with us, are more than they that be with them. And Elisha prayed and said, Lord, I pray thee open his eyes that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man, . . . and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire around about Elisha."—2 Kings 6: 15–17. But notwithstanding he may be thus surrounded with God's horses and chariots of fire, and with his angels whom he maketh spirits, and with his ministers whom he maketh as a burning flame, it must not be expected but that from time to time he will meet with many difficulties, severe trials, and sore conflicts in this warfare, so much so, that he may be moved thus to exclaim, with one who has sung.

> "O land of rest, for thee I sigh,
> When shall the moment come,
> When I shall lay my armor by,
> And dwell with Christ at home?"

And then again it is not unlikely that he may fall on the road in the march prior to the decisive battle of the great day; but it will be with his armor on, and with the joyful hope of rising again, as one refreshed with new wine, in the resurrection, to resume his onward march to join the immortal armies of heaven and unite in singing the victor's song.—1 Cor. 15: 55, 56; Rev. 15: 2–4.

> "They led the warrior to his couch,
> And calmly laid him down—
> They smoothed the pillow of his head,
> That soon should wear the crown
> Of fadeless light prepared for him
> In heaven from above,
> With those his labors here had saved,
> To shout their Savior's love.
>
> The armor of his hallowed faith
> Still shone upon his form;
> Brilliant success had heightened it
> In many a battle storm;
> That armor was in early youth
> His panoply and pride,
> The gift of heaven's grace to him,
> By heaven sanctified.
>
> He wore it when revilers raised
> Their impious voices high;
> It shelter'd him in peril's hour,
> In it he wished to die!
> 'T were highest happiness to gain
> An end so nobly sought.
> The warrior's hallowed shroud should be
> The mail in which he fought.
>
> Glorious the christian hero falls,
> From earthly fetters free,
> Beneath the ensign of the cross,
> Waving in victory!
> Behold him gazing on its folds,
> Anxious for its release,
> High hopes of heaven in his heart,
> And all the future peace."

4th. His reward and triumph. The last feature of our subject will now claim our attention for a few moments. This is an interesting one, and contains the christian warrior's motive powers to action. For it is in a measure by contemplating the star-gemmed crown, that he is encouraged to bear the self-denying and self-sacrificing cross of Christ. So the poet thought when he penned the following:

> "How sweet to reflect on those joys that await me
> In God's righteous kingdom, the haven of rest,
> Where angelic beings with welcome shall greet me,
> And lead me to mansions prepared for the blest.
> Encircled with light, and with glory enshrouded,
> My happiness perfect, my mind's sky unclouded,
> I'll bathe in the ocean of pleasure unbounded,
> And range with delight through the Eden of love."

Thus it was with "Paul the aged;" he steadily had his eye fixed upon the crown, and inspired with indomitable courage and energy to fight his way through, he could exclaim at last—"I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is a crown of righteousness laid up for me, which the Lord the righteous Judge will give unto me at that day, and not to me only, but unto all who love his appearing." 2 Tim. 4: 6–8. It was this "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious Epiphany of the great God and our Life-Giver, Jesus Messiah"—the crowning consummation—which enabled him, in no small degree, to cheerfully endure fiery trials and sufferings; and which stimulated those worthies recorded in the eleventh of Hebrews to undergo without a murmur those cruel and painful deaths to which they were subjected. They had respect unto the recompense of the reward, believing that they would attain unto a better resurrection, subsequent to which they also looked for a city that hath foundation, whose builder and maker is God, where they would drink from fountains of everlasting love while countless ages roll. They endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, ever willing to take of the spoiling of their goods, confident that the New Jerusalem had a more enduring substance for them reserved, which they would be permitted to enjoy forever; and pressed forward toward the mark for the prize of their high calling in Christ Jesus, to God's blessed kingdom and eternal glory.

And here we become somewhat embarrassed when we attempt to justly portray or speak of the nature, value, and extent of the "reward of the inheritance of the saints." But let this suffice; in the language of the munificent donor, it is "great." He declares to all his faithful soldiers, "Great shall be your reward in heaven." He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, shall have power over the nations, and rule them with a rod of iron, and break them to pieces like a potter's vessel. And I will give him the MORNING STAR. He shall walk with me in white. He shall feast upon the hidden manna, and have a right to the tree of life in the midst of the paradise of God. I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is the New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God, and I will write upon him my new name. He that overcometh shall be clothed in white raiment, shall enter in through the gates of the city, and be led to fountains of living waters, and God shall wipe all tears from their eyes, neither shall they hunger nor thirst any more, and there shall be no more death, (they will be exempted forever from this) nor sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I have overcome and have set down in my Father's throne. And they shall see his face, and his name shall be in their foreheads, and, as kings and priests of God, shall reign with him on the earth. Finally, "He that overcometh shall inherit all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be my son." While lo, and behold! he which testifieth these things, saith, Surely I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

Is there not contained in these precious promises "a great, exceeding and eternal weight of glory;" and should it not constrain us to say, with the good old patriarch Jacob, "It is enough?" We deem it useless to go over any more ground touching this; the Scriptures are full of it; indeed, the last promise quoted covers the entire ground—"all things."

> "I'm sure if the tongue of an angel I had,
> I could not completely the glory describe."

Men of the world often join the armies of earth, being actuated altogether by earthly motives, stimulated by either a selfish or revengeful spirit. Their cause is seldom a righteous one, which invariably (with rarely an exception) results in an ignoble end. But those who enlist under the glorious banner of the cross, engage in a good work; they take up arms in a holy cause; their bosoms are inspired with the patriotic spirit of heaven; their hearts glow with that celestial enthusiasm which burns in the breasts of angels; and it is by these cherubic flames of love and holy ardor that they are impelled to fall into the ranks and march forward unto the field of battle, unto the utter overthrow and extermination of all wrong, tyranny and injustice, the reinstatement, promotion and exaltation of all that is just, holy and good. They have the consciousness that their cause is of God, and relying implicitly upon his all-powerful arm, they have no fears but what success will ultimately attend them, reasoning with the apostle—"If God be with us, who can be against us?"

Who then will join with us in this righteous cause? Who feels disposed to unite with and augment the number of God's regiment? Who is willing to subscribe his hand to the articles of conditions as found recorded in the volume of Holy Writ; and thus become another "good soldier of Jesus Christ," lawfully equipped to "war a good warfare?" We want men of nerve here—men of decision of character, of courage, of unflinching firmness and indomitable perseverance, who will never desert when once enlisted. Is there not some who may have followed us in this discourse, who are yet "aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenant of promise, with no hope and without God in the world;" hence in the enemy's ranks, siding with the allied powers of darkness? Let such come forward at once, then; the rendezvous is yet open for the reception of recruits, the flag of invitation is still unfurled, beckoning—"Come!" The call for volunteers may still be heard through the land—"Whosoever will, let him come!" We have no press-gangs in this cause, to force individuals into the ranks, against their own will or inclination; no exciting their fears, nor arguments drawn from the dogmas of eternal torments or endless misery of ever and yet never-dying souls, in order to move them to come; but simply point them to the divine goodness, as exhibited in and through Christ Jesus—"Behold, the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever would believe on him might not perish, but have everlasting life." It is the contemplation of God's goodness that leadeth men to repentance.—Rom. 2: 4. And they must come voluntarily; "Whosoever will, let him come," reads the word. Come, then, "for all things are now ready." Soon, yea, very soon, the commissioned angel of God's presence will, with a loud and solemn voice—

> "Speak the sacred number sealed, > Speak the mystery revealed;"

And thine ears will be saluted with the emphatic declaration—"IT IS DONE!" The number of God's noble army will be completed, the broad pendant of the gospel that bids them welcome, will be seen no more waving in mercy's graceful undulations; the rendezvous will be closed; the door forever shut! Solemn truth! will you heed it? O God, touch the sinner's heart to feel the solemnity of the hour in which we live! Will you have your name, then, at once enrolled here, that it may be registered "in heaven" by waiting and attendant angels, which shall cause much joy in heaven; for there is renewed joy in heaven over one that enlisteth—one sinner that repenteth. O, may God help you to come in his own appointed way! That when the great and trying day, in all its awful sublimities and imposing splendors burst upon a guilty and heaven-daring world, a luke warm, hypocritical and sleeping church—when the mighty armies of earth and heaven shall confront each other in terrible array upon the wide and extended fields of Armageddon; when all the powers of darkness that be—devils, fiends, wicked men and angels, kings of the earth and great men—shall be concentrated together in one solid confederation, with satan at their head, to make his daring effort against Jesus and the Lamb of God, but now "the Lion of the tribe of Judah," to obtain and get possession of the world, which will decide its fate—the fate of men and angels, as is so vividly portrayed in the Apocalyptic visions of the Revelator; where the blessed Messiah is described clad in an invulnerable coat of mail, robed in vestments of a crimson dye, mounted upon his swift-winged courser—you may be among that war-like multitude of "the armies of heaven, following him upon white horses," going forth in one bold and unbroken phalanx, a consecrated host, "conquering and to conquer," amid the grand music of ten thousand harpers, discoursing the most beautiful and soul-animating strains—the loud hallelujahs of the redeemed myriads—the booming of heaven's thundering artillery—the graceful and heart-cheering waving of her resplendent and variegated banners, led on by their noble and all-powerful Commander, to certain victory, eternal honor, fame and glory, swelling ever and anon the mighty shout, "HALLELUJAH! FOR THE LORD GOD OMNIPOTENT REIGNETH."—"Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Amen.

> "Lift up anew thy standard high,
> Ever be this thy battle cry—
> For Christ to live and die,
> Press to the foremost fight;
> Be sure that to thy Leader's might > Thou shalt have the victory."

On Regeneration.

BRO. GRANT:—It is an important duty and precious privilege for christian brethren to present to one another, in the spirit of humility and love, with a single eye to the holy truth, their views of that truth, that God may be glorified in our increasing union therein.

We acknowledge that Scripture is its own best interpreter. Our divine and infallible Teacher has announced to a fallen world the great truth, that "Except a man be born (or begotten, gennethe) again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." "That which is born (or begotten) of the flesh is flesh; and that which is (begotten) of the Spirit is spirit."—John 3: 3–6.

Regeneration then plainly appears to be, a generating of a man by the Spirit of God, who has been generated by the flesh, not a reproduction of the man, but a change of the man, from an animal or carnal man, to a spiritual or holy man.

The analogy appears to be, that in both cases there is an active agent and means employed. "The natural man is begotten" by man in the use of the "seed of man," and "the spiritual man by" God, in the use of the incorruptible "seed of" the word, or truth of "God." This is confirmed by the following passage,—John 1: 13. The apostle writing of believers on the Son of God, declares, "Which were born (or begotten) not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born (or begotten) of God."—1 John 5: 1. "Of his own will begat he (God) us with the Word of truth."—James 1: 18. "Whosoever is born of God," etc.—1 John 3: 9.

The above declarations of holy truth are all in the present or past tense, and not in the future. Consequently, they determine the teaching of our Lord to be, that we must be begotten of the Spirit of God, or regenerated, in the present state, or we can never "enter the kingdom of God." To beget and to generate are synonymous terms. Moreover, the apostle plainly and positively declares, "Beloved, NOW are we the sons of God."—1 John 3: 2. This cannot be unless we are now regenerated or begotten of him. The words "born" and "begotten," in the Greek, are both forms of the same word, gennao. See John 5: 1.

The above passages, teaching so manifestly that we are regenerated, born again, and are NOW the sons of God, by faith in his Son, of the operation of the Holy Spirit, perfectly harmonize with the truth that we are not immortal, or incorruptible, until death shall be swallowed up in victory on the glorious morning of the resurrection. If, however, MAN is not regenerated—born again by the Spirit of God, before the awful hour of death, he dies in his sins; consequently, where Christ is gone he can never go, and his resurrection will be to condemnation and everlasting death. So Jesus told the Jews, "If ye believe not, ye shall die in your sins," etc. But he that "believeth that Jesus is the Christ (i. e., with the heart unto righteousness) IS (not shall be) born of God"—1 John 5: 1.

It is true, indeed, that the term begotten or born from the dead, is used in Rev. 1; 5 in reference to the resurrection of our Lord; but this involves no evidence that the passages adduced in this imperfect article, respectfully submitted, do not refer to that great moral or spiritual change by the Holy Spirit, without which "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God," etc. Without this he can have no holy communion with God here or hereafter.

This divine begetting is the basis, or origin, of all spiritual or holy life. Antecedently, man is "dead in trespasses and sins."—Eph. 2: 1. He is "in the flesh," a mere animal and carnal man, and "cannot please God."—Rom. 8: 8. Consequently, if we are not regenerated until the resurrection, we remain unreconciled to God until that period, and must come forth to the resurrection of condemnation, to be destroyed, soul and body, in the second death. Death will not change our character; neither will the resurrection. Our character and judgment will be "according to the deeds done in the body."—2 Cor. 5: 10.

Let us then, beloved brethren, be faithful to dying men, and assure them, on the authority of Jesus Christ, that "except (they are) born (or begotten) again" in the present short and uncertain mortal state, they "cannot see or enter the kingdom of God."—John 4: 3–5. Your servant in Jesus Christ for the truth's sake.

HENRY GREW.

☞ If the man who leads a moral life, but is as yet insensible of his own evil tendencies, would know what he is internally, let him reflect how he would appear to those around him, if every affection and thought of which he is conscious, were made visible to those in whose company he is. In the present state of society, the power of concealment is common to all, and is by all sensibly practised. But if any one in his natural state should, from any cause, lose the power of suppressing the spontaneous suggestions of his heart, he would at once be excluded from all society, though this society may differ from him in no other respect than that of possessing the power which he has lost.

Stick Together.

> When midst the wreck of fire and smoke,
> When cannons rend the skies asunder,
> And fierce dragoons with quickening stroke
> Upon the reeling regiment thunder,
> The ranks close up to sharp command,
> Till helmet's feather touches feather;
> Compact the furious shock they stand,
> And conquer! for they stick together!
>
> When, 'mid clouds of woe and want,
> Our comrades' walls rise fast and faster,
> And charging madly on our front,
> Come the black legions of disaster—
> Shall we present a wavering band,
> And fly like leaves before wild weather?
> No! side by side and hand in hand,
> We'll stand our ground and stick together!
>
> God gave us hands—one left, one right;
> The first to help ourselves, the other
> To stretch abroad in kindly might,
> To help along our faithful brother.
> Then if you see a brother fall,
> And bow his head before the weather,
> If you be not a dastard all,
> You'll help him up and stick together!

The Forerunner within the Veil.

"Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made a high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Heb. 6: 19, 20.

That part of the ancient tabernacle which was within the veil was called the Holy of Holies, and was the symbolic representation of the heavenly world,—the place pre-eminently of the Divine presence. No one was allowed to enter this sacred enclosure, and gaze upon the Shekinah (the light of brilliant purity representing the Majesty of God,) but the High Priest, and he only once a year, on the great day of At-one-ment, or Reconciliation. The other part of the tabernacle, called the Sanctuary, which was separated from the holiest place of all by the veil, was the symbolical representation of the present earthly-church-state, which is imperfect, and which needs to pass away, before the way into the holiest of all can be made manifest.—(See Heb. 9: 8.) Here is taught an important Bible truth, that there can be no glorified church while any portion of the church of Christ are in their mortal state dwelling upon earth. An impenetrable veil separates the church from the heavenly state, until all the church have been gathered out of each passing generation, when all shall be perfected together, and not one before the other.—(See Heb. 11: 39, 40.) The High-Priest only might enter within the veil, as the ordained mediator between God and his people. Now Christ, as the Mediator of the new covenant, and the High-Priest of our profession, has entered within the veil,—not into the symbol of heaven, but heaven itself. And he is called the FORERUNNER,—which means one who has gone into heaven BEFORE ANY OTHER. Christ is here declared to have been the first to enter into the presence of God. How does this agree with the present popular belief that holy people go to God directly after they die? Christ has been the first to enter heaven, although he did not enter there as the Redeemer of men until the world was about 4,000 years old! Enoch and Elijah are exceptions, because they never died. Christ is the Forerunner of such as have died. Then if Christ is the Forerunner, none of the ancient saints had gone to a state of glory. And if none of the ancient saints of God, what proof have we that modern saints go to heaven immediately after they die? The true Bible hope of future life is through a resurrection from the dead at the time of Christ's second coming. "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am, there (then) ye may be also." And, "Behold I come quickly!"—Christian Examiner.

Preaching like "Old Hundred."

The last time I met Dr. Taylor he was on his way home from Worcester, where he had preached on the Sabbath. It was in the cars, and I was returning to my field of labor after my summer vacation. He never met an old pupil but he sent him away a wiser man. This time he took for a text his compliment which he had just received from a stranger in Worcester, and enlarged upon it in his peculiarly impressive way. A member of the congregation, whom he had observed as a very attentive listener, stopped after the service, and offering him his hand, thanked him with great earnestness, saying, "Your preaching sounded like the tune of Old Hundred." "It was the best compliment I ever received," said the venerable man. "A man whose preaching has the depth, and sacredness, and power to move the multitude, as that honored tune has, ought to be grateful to his Master." From this point he enlarged, as one may easily imagine, upon the superficial, showy, ad captandum preaching which was becoming so popular, for the purpose of impressing upon his former pupil's mind the necessity of seeking for real logical power and strength of thought in his sermons. Preach as near as you can like Old Hundred. The tune will outlast many jiggery tunes of the new masters. That tune wears.

Perhaps no man ever obtained a more lasting power over men than this remarkable preacher. Yet he rejected all rhetorical flourishes, and dealt very little in imagery, but filled his sermons with rich thoughts and earnest devotion. Such sermons as his are the ones which do good in revivals. The pulpit of America has kept time and melody this winter with the tune of Old Hundred. Let churches and ministers heed the counsel of the departed saint, and seek for solidity and power, and not for gauze and tinsel. What the world needs is preaching that shall sound like Old Hundred.—Congregational Herald.

HOW TO STOP BLOOD.—Take the fine dust of tea, or the scrapings of the inside of tanned leather, and bind it close upon the wound, and blood will soon cease to flow. These articles are at all times accessible, and easy to be obtained. After the blood has ceased to flow, laudanum may be advantageously applied to the wound. Due regard to these instructions will save agitation of mind, and running for the surgeon, who would probably make no better prescription if present.

Hygiene.

"THIS IS FOR YOUR HEALTH."—Paul.

Breathing Damp or Moist Air.

One serious evil connected with the habit of keeping our rooms highly heated, is, that we thereby exhaust the air of its moisture; and leave it too dry for the membranes of the lungs, especially in those who are feeble. The atmosphere of the driest and most elevated mountainous regions retains natural moisture enough for the lungs, even though they are weak and diseased; but air, like that in most of our rooms, deprived of much of its natural moisture, cannot be otherwise than irritating.

It was formerly thought by many that stoves, especially closed stoves, had a peculiar effect upon the air to render it unhealthy. I am not aware that it makes any considerable difference, in this respect, what the fixtures are, provided they do not attain to a red heat. Dry air may produce unpleasant sensations, and perhaps give us headache, whether the dryness comes in one way or another. I have alluded to the natural moisture of the atmosphere. A few grains of water, in the form of vapor, are usually diffused through every cubic foot of air. The higher the temperature, the more moisture is demanded, in order, as it were, to fill the interstices. When our rooms are excessively hot, instead of having more watery vapor in the air, there is actually less; much of what was originally there being dried up, which renders the air irritating to the skin, and especially to the lining membrane of the lungs. Hence the absolute necessity, would we maintain health, of having water in our rooms for the purpose of evaporation; whether heated by stove, furnace, or fireplace. It depends on the degree of heat which is maintained, and not much on the fixtures. Wherever there is fire, as a general rule, there should be water.

Not one factory in fifty, in this manufacturing country, nor one school-room in ten, nor many counting-rooms, mechanics' shops, conference-houses, concert-halls, town-halls, churches, or sitting-rooms, have the slightest provision for replenishing the moisture of their air. It seems hardly thought of. A strange, not to say fatal, mistake! On inquiring, in schools and elsewhere, why water is not kept in the room for evaporation, I am often told that it exposes people to take cold. How such an opinion originated, I cannot conceive; but it has about as good a foundation as many other opinions which pass current in society, even though they have been handed down to us from past generations.

Few things are more common in a dry atmosphere than chapped hands. But can our dry air produce this effect on the thicker, tougher skin of the hands, without injuring, in still greater degree, the more delicate lining membrane of the lungs? And if the lungs are at all inclined to disease, and especially to hemorrhage, may not such a dry air be likely to rouse it to activity, or hasten it to a crisis?

Among the very few vessels of any kind kept in hot rooms for the purposes of evaporation, I have not found one in twenty of them right. They are, unnecessarily, too deep. Evaporation is slow or rapid, in these cases, in proportion to the extent of surface, and not to the quantity of water used. A gallon of water, in a shallow pan, will be much sooner evaporated than a gallon in a deep one. Let this be remembered.

The very common preference for a southern climate, or perhaps for a sea air, in certain consumptive cases, may have had its origin in the fact, that the moister air of the south, and of our seaboard in general, has sometimes proved favorable. I have observed, however, that those who go south in these circumstances, and do not remain there, are less frequently benefited than they who remain. I have also observed, that going northward a little way, into an elevated or mountainous region, is sometimes quite as useful as going south. Both give temporary rest to the weary bodies and souls of those who resort thither, and a few recover. And he who recovers, though but one of a thousand, is reckoned as clear proof of the advantages of migration; while, of those who die, nothing is said why they die.—Laws of Health.

CURE FOR BRONCHITIS.—One of our cleverest and most reliable friends informs us that common mullen leaves, smoked in a new pipe—one in which tobacco has never been used—is a sure and certain cure for bronchitis. The remedy is simple and innocent, and within the reach of all. Recollect that it is not the remedy of a retired physician, whose sands of life have nearly run out, but is given to us by one who has tried it himself, and seen it tried with others, and has never known it to fail in effecting a permanent cure. The remedy is simple, and we can discover no harm likely to rise from a trial.—Scientific Amer.

The Crisis' Improved Form.

BRO. GRANT:—I wish to say a word concerning the improved form of the first No. of Vol. IX. of The World's Crisis. I am very much pleased with it, not only because it is enlarged, and so made capable of taking rank with the best and most respectable family newspapers, but its mechanical arrangement and finish I think most admirable. Yet it is not what the paper appears to be, so much as what it really is, that most deserves our encomiums.

Its name—THE WORLD'S CRISIS—teems with both natural and revealed truths, the most soul-stirring and awful, that ever pressed upon the human mind.

Its motto—(1) "Behold, (2) I come quickly; (3) and my reward is with me"—is most beautiful. Brief, but how comprehensive! It is multum in parvo. And how perfectly it expresses the great work God is now carrying on in his church, by Millennium and Advent movements—a work destined to go onward and never cease, until the church shall, with one universal voice, echo the cry, "Behold, he cometh;" and rejoice, too, in the fact, because his reward is with him, to give to every man as his works shall be.

In fine, its diversified, but timely, critical and practical subjects, the product of disciplined but independent and original minds, written by faithful and experienced brethren—laymen and preachers—together with its home and foreign news, especially the latter—to which may be added the kind, open, manly, and christian spirit, which I hope may never cease to characterize the paper—makes it A Religious Family Journal I take great pleasure in commending to our brethren. May the Lord bless its editor and writers with heavenly wisdom, and make the paper eminently useful to his church.

Fraternally yours,

The Man whom the Printer delights to Honor.

It is the man who first selects a good subject. He then reads and meditates until he has well defined views before his own mind of what he wishes to say. He then says it in plain words, and stops when he has said it. But there are some minor matters to which he attends. He spells his words correctly. He puts his caps and lower-case letters where they should be. His punctuation is right. He dots his i's and crosses his t's, but not his l's and h's. And all is written in a hand so legible, that the compositor can set it up without the use of one or two "devils" to run to the editor and others to find out what the writer was trying to say.

Let those who write,
Seek the printer's delight.

Home.

AIR.—Old Cabin Home.

Awake, my heart, to-day, from slumber turn away,
For the last sands of time are departing;
Sweet is the sound I hear, Israel's King is near,
To take his weary children home.

CHORUS.
Soon shall I reach my home,
To dwell with the loved ones forever;
There grief cannot come in our Eden home,
And tears will dim the eyes, O never.

I'm weary while I roam, and sigh to reach my home,
Where the soft summer breezes are blowing;
To meet my Savior there, to join the angel choir
That sing in my own peaceful home.
CHORUS.

I'll leave each earthly scene, for pastures ever green;
To the fair fields of bliss I am going,
Where the sun is ever bright, and a flood of golden light
Beams upon my own blissful home.
CHORUS.

The crystal river glides by the Redeemer's side,
With flowers eternally blooming;
While loud the anthems ring, all hail! to Christ our King,
In Eden, my own happy home.
CHORUS.

The Holy Ghost.

THE CROWNING OBJECTS OF ITS ENDOWMENT.

"The spirit of the Lord is upon me."—LUKE 4: 18.

Why, and for what end? "Because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. . . . to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Thus God revealed the nature, the operation and object of his spirit, as developed in Jesus, our Lord. Isa. 61: 1–3. Hence, if we ever are partakers of "the spirit of Christ," we shall have the same mind, and the same aims, on to the preaching of "the acceptable year of the Lord."—Isa. 11: 1–6; Ezek. 1–48.

"Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost." Then she spoke prophetically of Jesus and his triumphant "performance of the things" predicted.—Luke 1: 41–45.

Mary said: "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Savior;" and she spoke in the same strain of prophetic vision, relative to the final victory over all foes:—"As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed forever!"—Luke 1: 47–55.

Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied of what God would do "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant; the oath which he sware to our father Abraham." Thus the spirit in him prophesies on and on to the certain conquest which will crown and consummate the oath-confirmed covenant of grace.—Luke 1: 67–79. So it was with Simeon and Anna.

The same spirit, with the same objects, was given to the Apostles. Jesus said: "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. . . . He breathed on them and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. This spirit was their qualification for their ministry. Thus they were allied to Jesus, in spirit and in prophetic testimony.—John 20: 21–23.

The crowning promise to the Apostles, in order that they might fulfill their mission, as preachers of the Gospel was, that the Holy Spirit would be sent to them.—John 14: 26; 15: 26. Our Lord assured them that this promised spirit's work in them and through them would embrace "the judgment"—"the acceptable year of the Lord."—John 16: 7–11.

The spirit dispensed on the day of Pentecost exhibits these, and only these, attributes and objects. "THE SPIRIT came like a rushing mighty wind, and filled the place." Then they all prophesied and preached the gospel. Peter's sermon, by this spirit, was the first full gospel, or Second Advent sermon, ever proclaimed among men. The Holy Ghost was given for this very end. Hence they preached the gospel to the poor, but brought forward the crowning truth as to the "Great and notable day of the Lord."—Acts 2: 1–46; 4; 17: 31.

Thus Paul's preaching with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven, taught the service of "the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from Heaven," and his salvation.—1 Thess. 1: 3–10; Heb. 9: 28; Titus 2: 11–14; 2 Tim. 4: 1–8; Rev. 1: 10. John's "spirit" was altogether prophetic.

Much of this great theme is not here fully expressed; but the argument, so far developed, is, that in proportion as ministers now have "the spirit of Christ," (Rom. 8: 9,) they will exhibit the same wisdom, "mind the same things," and "preach the preaching" that he did, prophetically; not omitting "THE ACCEPTABLE YEAR OF THE LORD."

The spirit of some who ignore the crowning glory of the gospel minister, as above exhibited in Jesus and his Apostles, stands convicted as another spirit than the spirit of God! The "one God" gives only "one spirit" to sustain and spread the "one faith!"

Hence those "do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God," who imagine that the spirit is given to gratify or "happify them"—as its end! It was not so with prophets, apostles, or our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ. "The spirit of Christ" was prophetic.—Rev. 19: 10. Its highest present and proper sphere of operation is in prophesy and promise.

Words of Wisdom.

I have been young and now am old, and as I stand before God to night, I declare that nothing I have given in charity is regretted. O no! It is the riches we keep that perish; that which we give away, abides with us forever; it impresses itself on our character and tells on our eternal destiny; for the habit of charity formed in this life will accompany us to the next. The bud which begins to open here will blossom in full expansion hereafter, to delight the eye of angels and beautify the Paradise of God. Let us, then, now and on every occasion hereafter, practice that liberality which in death we shall approve, and reprobate the parsimony we shall then condemn.—President Nott.

For the Crisis.

Man.

It is Saturday night. The Discussion has arrived—is laid upon the table. The company of a Baptist minister precludes the propriety of giving it attention. The morning comes; the new book attracts the notice of the guest. The title-page is read. An inquiry is made, "Who is this Elder Grant?" Ans. Editor of the World's Crisis.

"I would not read it—I have enough of truth to answer my calling. I can refute very easily what some of the Advents teach—the annihilation of the wicked—for matter cannot be annihilated; wood, when it is consumed, is not annihilated." This was the substance of his remarks. The season of public worship passed. Afternoon and evening the new book is read and listened to—time is taken for its careful perusal.

I should judge that the first and a part of the second evening there was an even balance in the minds of the hearers, and then prejudice began to give way before the light of truth, and the defence of the negative was carried forward with a spirit well known to a speaker when the subject is received rather than rejected.

What is man? How important the question, especially when viewed in the light of the Scripture, "Know thyself." To know a thing perfectly, it must be analyzed. The first thing to be done in analyzing a solid substance, is to dissolve it. According to the common version of the Scriptures, man (a living man, of course, for a dead man is not commanded to know himself,) is composed of spirit, soul and body.—1 Thess. 5: 23. The body is made of the dust of the earth—a wonderful piece of mechanism. The spirit (which is proved to be breath, Gen. 2: 7,) enters and operates upon the organs of this piece of machinery, producing all the varied emotions of a human soul, life, thought and feeling. The difference in souls is the difference in organisms, and the cultivation they receive, whether rational or irrational. We speak of a person as being a generous soul. Why is he so? Because he has the organ of benevolence, and has cultivated it by self-denial and seeking out and supplying the wants of others. Of another as a literary character. And why? He has the organs of acquiring, loving and retaining knowledge, and has cultivated them by an application to those things which give him knowledge. So it may be said in some respects of the brute creation.

If this is true, the soul has a beginning and an end—is dependent on the breath or air, operating on the machinery to give life and action. Our breath departs, and we die. So in Adam we all die. But in Christ all are made alive—all come forth—some to life to die no more, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. The shame of having all their sins exposed, and the contempt of being banished from all God's dominions, having no place where they can be found. Being the second death, there is no hope of life or restoration to a place of residence in all the universe.

There is no necessity for the annihilation of matter for our argument. Fire decomposes wood. A part goes off in smoke, and a part falls into ashes. We don't call smoke wood or ashes wood. Death decomposes man—his breath goes forth, his mind, his thoughts, his feelings perish, come to an end, his body returns to dust. Dust was not man before he was made. The dust of man's body is not man, any more than the dust he was made of was man before he was made.

"If Christ be not raised . . . then they also who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." All depends on the resurrection of Christ. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." Some will say, with what body do they come? The apostle brings grain to illustrate his subject. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Does it all die? No, there is a germ that, if it dies, all hope of a crop is lost. What is the germ in the dead? Is it any thing that can be found in the natural man? Has the natural man an inner man that is renewed day by day? I know his old man will increase in strength as he daily performs the works of the flesh; but Paul exhorts us to put off concerning the former conversation, the old man which is corrupt . . . . and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. Is not this the germ? Moreover the Scriptures testify that, "If the spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

What is this new man? an entity separate from the one that is composed of soul, body and spirit? On the same principle that we call a person a generous soul, we call him a righteous soul, made so by the organ of reverence for the Supreme Being, and cultivating it by believing what He says, (consequently doing as he is bidden, for faith without works is dead being alone, even as the body without the spirit is dead) and that faith is imputed to him for righteousness. If this is correct, neither new man or old man is a distinct entity separate from the creature made of dust, for they are produced by the union of body and spirit-breath.

A dark gloom hangs over the condition of the wicked dead. That they will have a resurrection seems plainly taught by Christ. John 5: 28, 29. "For the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Neither can a second death be inflicted until there is a resurrection from the first death. Who will think it a small affair to have the wicked start to life again, and come in the same character they sustained when they went down into the grave, enemies of God, of his Son, of his people, of his truth? Does any one ask, Why not let them remain? How can God sustain his character as a righteous Being in letting that vile hypocrite, who was thought very good by many, remain in darkness, and not be raised and brought to an account? Paul says, "So then shall every one of us give an account of himself to God."

In the light of the world to come every thing will be made manifest; no sin will be forgotten. Christ will be Judge, who needeth not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man."

Go, Labor On!

"I know thy works, and [illegible] tience."—Rev. 2: 2.

Go, labor on! spend and [illegible]
Thy joy to do thy Master'[illegible]
It is the way that Master we[illegible]
Should not the servant tread [illegible]

Go, labor on! 'tis not for naught—
All earthly loss is heavenly gain.
Men heed thee not, men praise thee not—
The Master praises! what are men?

Go, labor on! enough, enough,
If Jesus praise thee—if he deign
To notice e'en thy willing mind,
No toil for him shall be in vain.

Go, labor on! thy hands are weak,
Thy knees are faint, thy soul cast down;
Yet falter not, the prize is near—
The throne, the kingdom, and the crown.

See thousands dying at thy side—
Thy brethren, kindred, friends at home;
See millions perishing afar—
Haste, brethren! to the rescue come!

Toil on, toil on! thou soon shalt find
For labor rest, for exile home:
Soon shalt thou hear the Bridegroom's voice,
The midnight peal, "Behold, I come!"

A Name.

"Must have a name?" What for? "O, to distinguish us." Who from? The devil's children? Your works ought to do that. "God's children?" What for? So that you can build a little sectarian pen and do what you can to hinder the accomplishment of Jesus' prayer—"That they may all be ONE"—"one flock and one shepherd?" "Want to be separate." What for? So that those that see you coming will say, "mad dog," and honest christians will shut their ears to the truth, for fear you are going to proselyte them to some sect? But what name shall we take? The Bible has several, such as Brethren, Believers, Saints, Christians, Disciples, etc. "Now tell us which, for we prefer to be called Adventists." Yes, yes, the Bible gives plenty of names, expressive and appropriate, all of them. We dont know which to take among so many, so we wont have EITHER, but will go and hatch one up that the prophets, apostles and patriarchs never heard of, and that God has never given us. And we'll say its necessary for us to have this new name, because the Bible has a dozen, and we dont know which to take; we are not willing to have all of them occasionally, as the apostles did, so we wont have either of them, but go to work and make a new one for theological wiseacres to quarrel over, as to whom it belongs and try to push one another out of possession of it.

Yes, if you have a new gospel, that no one else ever heard of, different from that of Jesus, and Paul, and Peter, and John, and ancient Christians, then by all means have a new name for it—no matter what—only before you decide on the new Gospel, name, etc., read Gal. 1: 8. But if the old Gospel will answer, why will not the old name, given by God at Antioch, answer to designate it? Let us be Christians.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 17.

MY DEAR SISTER:—It is often the case that even the soul that is wholly in submission to the will of God, has its days of barrenness and desolation. Clouds are about the throne, so that prayer cannot seemingly pierce through. The Bible affords no delight, and in vain its pages are turned over, in search of something to interest and edify. Faith seems to be dormant, and no longer grasps the blessing. Hope folds her wings, and the spirit sinks in utter despondency. Love no longer feasts her eyes on Christ; she no longer sees in him transcendent loveliness; no longer rejoices in his presence. And now is the time for one of Satan's specious devices. He seeks to lead the individual to cast away his confidence—to doubt his acceptance—and, by the indulgence of unbelief, to lose the shield by which all of his fiery darts are quenched.

"You have been deceived."—"You are fallen from grace."—"If you were wholly consecrated to God, you would not have such feelings as these," are no unfrequent temptations. Sometimes, to add to the speciality of his suggestions, he will inject into the mind various vain and foolish thoughts; he will often fill the mind with impatient, proud, enviable, malicious, and even blasphemous thoughts, and so powerfully operate upon the individual's mind, as to prevent for a time all resistance; he seems to have such a grasp upon it, that the individual has no power to ward off the temptations. He forces them upon him, and then endeavors to make him believe that they originate from his own evil heart—that they are the offspring of a corrupt, unsanctified nature. But as soon as the sanctified heart is released in a measure from the power of the temptation—as soon as the submissive will can have freedom to operate—how quickly does it repel [illegible] pathize with the tempted one! She [illegible] a time when, on her way to church, the temptation to pride and to walk affectedly, took powerful hold upon her. It seemed as though there was a grasp upon her body, forcing her thus to do. The matter was forgotten during the services, but as soon as she knelt in her chamber to pray, as was her custom after returning from the house of God, she was instantly met by the suggestion—"How proud you felt, and how affectedly you walked on your way to meeting, and now think to pray!" The cloven foot was discovered; the reply was —"Thou art Satan; get thee behind me!" He fled—the dark shadow was gone—light shone—the confidence was not cast away, and prayer winged its way to heaven!

Well does she recollect five dreadful weeks of conflict, when the soul, faint, weary and disheartened, was well nigh ready to yield her all-conquering shield, and in utter despair cry out, "O God! thou hast indeed forsaken me!" Each wily suggestion had been promptly withstood until the last—it was this; "If you had done right in imputing those suggestions to Satan, God would have manifested his approval long ere this, and not permitted you to remain so long destitute of his sensible presence." How exceedingly specious was this temptation—it really appeared plausible; she looked at it; she pondered it o'er in her mind, and, half yielding to its influence, left to seek help from a devoted sister. "O, sister P——," she exclaimed, "I fear that I am backsliding!" "I hope not," said sister P. She then told her all about it; but, finding that the utterance of that unbelieving sentence had changed the "heaviness," caused by "manifold temptations," into darkness, she thought it best to retrace her steps; and, while every feeling was against what she now uttered, she made a desperate effort to grasp her falling shield by saying this; "I will, with my present feelings, submit to God, and I believe that Jesus saves me just now!" Her shield was regained—light shone upon her heart—the witness came, and now with a feeling soul she exclaimed, "Praise the Lord! Jesus saves me just now!" She hastened home, and to her chamber, to pour out her thanksgiving before the Lord; but as she knelt, the dark cloud enveloped her, and Satan whispered, "where are all of your good feelings now? They were all imaginary, and you are just where you were before." Mightily did that sister cry to God, and as the poet has expressed it:—

"In hope believing against hope,
Self-desperate, I believe."

So did she believe, and Satan vanquished, fled, and the clouds poured down rain abundantly upon her thirsty soul. For weeks she bathed in an ocean of light, love, peace and joy, and how plainly she saw the propriety of trusting God in the darkest hour.

Is God Every Body, and Every Body God?

From Fables of Infidelity, published by Hastings. Price 15 cents.

Pantheism is that perversion of reason and language which denies God's personality, and calls some imaginary soul of the world, or the world itself, by his name. While Pantheists are fully agreed upon the propriety of getting rid of a God who could note their conduct, and call them to account for it hereafter, and who would claim to exercise any authority over them here, they are by no means agreed, either in India, Germany, or America, as to what they shall call by his name. Public opinion necessitates them to say they believe in a God, but almost every one has his own private opinion as to what it is. We shall speak of it as we hear it pronounced from the lips of its prophets, here, as well as in the writings of its expounders, in Europe and Asia. Some of them declare, that it is some absolutely unknown cause of all the phenomena of the universe, and others, that it is the universe itself. A large class speak of it as the great soul of the world, while the more materialistic regard it as the world itself, body and soul; the soul being the source of all the imponderable forces, such as gravitation, heat, light, electricity, magnetism, galvanism, vegetable and animal life, and especially the mesmeric influence, of which many of them regard intellect as a modification; and the body being the sum of all the ponderable substances, such as air, water, earth, minerals, vegetables, and bodies of animal and men. This creed is popularly expressed in the sentence so often heard, "God is every thing, and every thing is God." But this vast generalization of all things into the higher unity—this exalting of monkeys, men, snails, and paving stones to the same level of divinity—by no means meets the views of the more unphilosophical and as[illegible] gods and goddesses, for the very [illegible]

distinction? This leveling [illegible] generally confined to the German Pantheists, of whom there are multitudes in this city. Their more ambitious American brethren ascribe the contented humility which accepts it, to the continual influence of the fumes of tobacco and lager beer. Man—the soul of man—is the great divinity of our American Pantheists. "The doctrine of the soul—first soul, and second soul, and evermore soul"—is the doctrine which is to regenerate the world. God, in their view, is nothing till he attains self-consciousness in man. "The universal does not attract us till housed in the individual. Who heeds the waste abyss of possibility? Standing on the bare ground, my head bathed by the blithe air, and uplifted into infinite space, all mere egotism vanishes. The currents of the universe being circulate through me, I am part or particle of God." "I stand here to say, 'Let us worship the mighty and transcendent soul.'" "God attains to self-consciousness only in the human soul." "Honor yourself." "Reverence your own individuality." "The soul of man is the highest intelligence in the universe." Such are the dogmas which, under the name of Positive Philosophy, are poured forth oracularly, unsupported by reason or argument, by the prophets of the new dispensation—the last and highest achievement of the human intellect.

It is very unfortunate, however, for the honor of the prophets of the nineteenth century, that this profound discovery was invented and illustrated, patented and peddled, by the Hindoos, among the people of India, two thousand years before the divinity had struggled into self-consciousness in the mighty and transcendent souls of Schelling, Hegel, and Strauss—of Atkinson, Parker, or Emerson. We mean to show in this lecture, that it is an Antiquated, Hypocritical, Demoralizing Atheism.

1. Pantheism is an Antiquated Heresy. It has rotted and putrified among the worshipers of cats and monkeys, and holy bulls, and bits of sticks and stones, on the banks of the Ganges, for more than two thousand years; yet it is now hooked up out of its dunghill, and hawked about among christian people, as a prime new discovery of modern philosophy for getting rid of Almighty God. As the Hindoo Shasters are undoubtedly the sources from which French, German and American philosophers have borrowed their dogmas, without leave or acknowledgment; and as is generally the case with depredators, they have not had time to take the whole system, we shall gratify and edify the public by a view of this sublime theology, as exhibited in the writings of the Positive Philosophers of India.

* Emerson.

"When existing in the temporary imperfect state of Sagun, Brahm (the Pantheist deity) wills to manifest the universe. For this purpose he puts forth his omnipotent energy, which is variously styled in the different systems now under review. He puts forth his energy for what? For the effecting of a creation out of nothing? 'No,' says one of the Shasters, but to 'produce from his own divine substance a multiform universe.' By the spontaneous exertion of this energy he sends forth, from his own divine [illegible] a countless host of essences, like innumerable sparks issuing from the blazing fire, or myriads of rays from the resplendent sun. These detached portions of Brahm—these separated divine essences—soon become individuated systems, destined, in time, to occupy different forms prepared for their reception; whether these be fixed or movable, animate or inanimate, forms of god or men, forms of animal, vegetable, or mineral existence."

"Having been separated from Brahm in his imperfect state of Sagun, they carry along with them a share of those principles qualities and attributes that characterize that state, though predominating in very different degrees and proportions: either according to their respective capacities, or the retributive awards of an eternal ordination. Amongst others it is specially noted, that as Brahm at that time had awakened into a consciousness of his own existence, there does inhere in each separated soul [illegible] notion, or a conviction, of its own distin[illegible] independent, individual existence. Laboring under this delusive notion, or conviction, the soul has lost the knowledge of its own proper nature—its divine origin and ultimate destiny. It ignorantly regards itself as an inferior entity, instead of knowing itself to be what it truly is; a consubstantial, though it may be an infinitesimally minute portion of the great whole, a universal spirit.

"Each individual soul being thus [illegible]

[illegible] had no beginning or birth, though its separate individuality originated in time. [illegible] is eternal a parte post; it will have no end—no death; though its separate individuality will terminate in time. [illegible] manifestation in time is not a creation [illegible] it is an effluence from the eternal fou[illegible] spirit. Its disappearance from the [illegible] of time is not an extinction of essence—reduction to nonentity; it is only a refl[illegible] ence into its original source. As an emanation from the supreme, eternal spirit, it [illegible] from everlasting to everlasting. Neither can it be said to be of finite dimension[illegible] on the contrary, says the sacred oracl[illegible] 'being identified with the Supreme Brahm it participates in his infinity.'

"After having enumerated all the elementary principles, atoms and qualiti[illegible] successively evolved from Brahm, one [illegible] the sacred writings states, that though e[illegible] of these had distinct powers, yet they e[illegible] isted separate and disunited, without orde[illegible] or harmonious adaptation of parts; th[illegible] until they were duly combined together, [illegible] was impossible to produce this universe, [illegible] animated beings; and that therefore it wa[illegible] requisite to adopt other means than fortu[illegible] tous chance for giving them an appropri[illegible] combination and symmetrical arrangemen[illegible] The Supreme, accordingly, produced an eg[illegible] in which the elementary principles mi[illegible] be deposited, and nurtured into maturity. "All the primary atoms, qualities and pri[illegible] ciples—the seeds of future worlds—th[illegible] had been evolved from the substance [illegible] Brahm, were now collected together, a[illegible] deposited in the newly produced egg. An[illegible] into it, along with them, entered the sel[illegible] existent himself, under the assumed form o[illegible] Brahma; and then he sat vivifying, [illegible] panding, and combining the elements, [illegible] whole year of the creation, or four thou[illegible] and three hundred millions of solar years. During this amazing period, the wondrou[illegible] egg floated like a bubble on the abyss o[illegible] primeval waters, increasing in size, an[illegible] blazing refulgent as a thousand suns. A[illegible] length the Supreme, who dwelt therein [illegible] burst the shell of the stupendous egg, an[illegible] issued forth under a new form, with [illegible] thousand heads, a thousand eyes, a [illegible] thousand arms. Along with him the[illegible] sued forth another form, huge and meas[illegible] less. What could that be? All the e[illegible] mentary principles having now been ma[illegible] tured, and disposed into an endless vari[illegible] of orderly collocations, and combined in[illegible] one harmonious whole, they darted in[illegible] visible manifestation under the form of [illegible] present glorious universe! A universe [illegible] finished, and ready made, with its [illegible] apparatus of earth, sun, moon and sta[illegible] What, then, is this multiform univer[illegible] It is but a harmoniously arranged [illegible]

The Crisis' Improved Form.

BRO. GRANT:—I wish to say a word concerning the improved form of the first No. of Vol. IX. of The World's Crisis. I am very much pleased with it, not only because it is enlarged, and so made capable of taking rank with the best and most respectable family newspapers, but its mechanical arrangement and finish I think most admirable. Yet it is not what the paper appears to be, so much as what it really is, that most deserves our encomiums.

Its name—THE WORLD'S CRISIS—teems with both natural and revealed truths, the most soul-stirring and awful, that ever pressed upon the human mind.

Its motto—(1) "Behold, (2) I come quickly; (3) and my reward is with me"—is most beautiful. Brief, but how comprehensive! It is multum in parvo. And how perfectly it expresses the great work God is now carrying on in his church, by Millennium and Advent movements—a work destined to go onward and never cease, until the church shall, with one universal voice, echo the cry, "Behold, he cometh;" and rejoice, too, in the fact, because his reward is with him, to give to every man as his works shall be.

In fine, its diversified, but timely, critical and practical subjects, the product of disciplined but independent and original minds, written by faithful and experienced brethren—laymen and preachers—together with its home and foreign news, especially the latter—to which may be added the kind, open, manly, and christian spirit, which I hope may never cease to characterize the paper—makes it A Religious Family Journal. I take great pleasure in commending to our brethren. May the Lord bless its editor and writers with heavenly wisdom, and make the paper eminently useful to his church.

Fraternally yours,
P. B. MORGAN.

The Man whom the Printer delights to Honor.

It is the man who first selects a good subject. He then reads and meditates until he has well defined views before his own mind of what he wishes to say. He then says it in plain words, and stops when he has said it. But there are some minor matters to which he attends. He spells his words correctly. He puts his caps and lower-case letters where they should be. His punctuation is right. He dots his i's and crosses his t's, but not his l's and h's. And all is written in a hand so legible, that the compositor can set it up without the use of one or two "devils" to run to the editor and others to find out what the writer was trying to say.

Let those who write,
Seek the printer's delight.

Home.

AIR.—Old Cabin Home.

Awake, my heart, to-day, from slumber turn away,
For the last sands of time are departing;
Sweet is the sound I hear, Israel's King is near,
To take his weary children home.

CHORUS.
Soon shall I reach my home,
To dwell with the loved ones forever;
There grief cannot come in our Eden home,
And tears will dim the eyes, O never.

I'm weary while I roam, and sigh to reach my home,
Where the soft summer breezes are blowing;
To meet my Savior there, to join the angel choir
That sing in my own peaceful home.
CHORUS.

I'll leave each earthly scene, for pastures ever green;
To the fair fields of bliss I am going,
Where the sun is ever bright, and a flood of golden light
Beams upon my own blissful home.
CHORUS.

The crystal river glides by the Redeemer's side,
With flowers eternally blooming;
While loud the anthems ring, all hail! to Christ our King,
In Eden, my own happy home.
CHORUS.

The Holy Ghost.

THE CROWNING OBJECTS OF ITS BESTOWMENT.

"The spirit of the Lord is upon me."—LUKE 4: 18.

Why, and for what end? "Because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. . . . to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Thus God revealed the nature, the operation and object of his spirit, as developed in Jesus, our Lord. Isa. 61: 1–3. Hence, if we ever are partakers of "the spirit of Christ," we shall have the same mind, and the same aims, on to the preaching of "the acceptable year of the Lord."—Isa. 11: 1–6; Ezek. 1–48.

"Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost." Then she spoke prophetically of Jesus and his triumphant "performance of the things" predicted.—Luke 1: 41–45.

Mary said: "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Savior;" and she spoke in the same strain of prophetic vision, relative to the final victory over all foes:—"As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed forever!"—Luke 1: 47–55.

Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied of what God would do "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant; the oath which he sware to our father Abraham." Thus the spirit in him prophesies on and on to the certain conquest which will crown and consummate the oath-confirmed covenant of grace.—Luke 1: 67–79. So it was with Simeon and Anna.

The same spirit, with the same objects, was given to the Apostles. Jesus said: "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. . . . He breathed on them and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. This spirit was their qualification for their ministry. Thus they were allied to Jesus, in spirit and in prophetic testimony.—John 20: 21–23.

The crowning promise to the Apostles, in order that they might fulfill their mission, as preachers of the Gospel was, that the Holy Spirit would be sent to them.—John 14: 26; 15: 26. Our Lord assured them that this promised spirit's work in them and through them would embrace "the judgment"—"the acceptable year of the Lord."—John 16: 7–11.

The spirit dispensed on the day of Pentecost exhibits these, and only these, attributes and objects. "THE SPIRIT came like a rushing mighty wind, and filled the place." Then they all prophesied and preached the gospel. Peter's sermon, by this spirit, was the first full gospel, or Second Advent sermon, ever proclaimed among men. The Holy Ghost was given for this very end. Hence they preached the gospel to the poor, but brought forward the crowning truth as to the "Great and notable day of the Lord."—Acts 2: 1–46; 4; 17: 31.

Thus Paul's preaching with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven, taught the service of "the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from Heaven," and his salvation.—1 Thess. 1: 3–10; Heb. 9: 28; Titus 2: 11–14; 2 Tim. 4: 1–8; Rev. 1: 10. John's "spirit" was altogether prophetic.

Much of this great theme is not here fully expressed; but the argument, so far developed, is, that in proportion as ministers now have "the spirit of Christ," (Rom. 8: 9,) they will exhibit the same wisdom, "mind the same things," and "preach the preaching" that he did, prophetically; not omitting "THE ACCEPTABLE YEAR OF THE LORD."

The spirit of some who ignore the crowning glory of the gospel minister, as above exhibited in Jesus and his Apostles, stands convicted as another spirit than the spirit of God! The "one God" gives only "one spirit" to sustain and spread the "one faith!"

Hence those "do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God," who imagine that the spirit is given to gratify or "happify them"—as its end! It was not so with prophets, apostles, or our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ. "The spirit of Christ" was prophetic.—Rev. 19: 10. Its highest present and proper sphere of operation is in prophecy and promise.

Words of Wisdom.

I have been young and now am old, and as I stand before God to night, I declare that nothing I have given in charity is regretted. O no! It is the riches we keep that perish; that which we give away, abides with us forever; it impresses itself on our character and tells on our eternal destiny; for the habit of charity formed in this life will accompany us to the next. The bud which begins to open here will blossom in full expansion hereafter, to delight the eye of angels and beautify the Paradise of God. Let us, then, now and on every occasion hereafter, practice that liberality which in death we shall approve, and reprobate the parsimony we shall then condemn.—President Nott.

Man.

It is Saturday night. The Discussion has arrived—is laid upon the table. The company of a Baptist minister precludes the propriety of giving it attention. The morning comes; the new book attracts the notice of the guest. The title-page is read. An inquiry is made, "Who is this Elder Grant?" Ans. Editor of the World's Crisis.

"I would not read it—I have enough of truth to answer my calling. I can refute very easily what some of the Advents teach—the annihilation of the wicked—for matter cannot be annihilated; wood, when it is consumed, is not annihilated." This was the substance of his remarks. The season of public worship passed. Afternoon and evening the new book is read and listened to—time is taken for its careful perusal.

I should judge that the first and a part of the second evening there was an even balance in the minds of the hearers, and then prejudice began to give way before the light of truth, and the defence of the negative was carried forward with a spirit well known to a speaker when the subject is received rather than rejected.

What is man? How important the question, especially when viewed in the light of the Scripture, "Know thyself." To know a thing perfectly, it must be analyzed. The first thing to be done in analyzing a solid substance, is to dissolve it. According to the common version of the Scriptures, man (a living man, of course, for a dead man is not commanded to know himself,) is composed of spirit, soul and body.—1 Thess. 5: 23. The body is made of the dust of the earth—a wonderful piece of mechanism. The spirit (which is proved to be breath, Gen. 2: 7,) enters and operates upon the organs of this piece of machinery, producing all the varied emotions of a human soul, life, thought and feeling. The difference in souls is the difference in organisms, and the cultivation they receive, whether rational or irrational. We speak of a person as being a generous soul. Why is he so? Because he has the organ of benevolence, and has cultivated it by self-denial and seeking out and supplying the wants of others. Of another as a literary character. And why? He has the organs of acquiring, loving and retaining knowledge, and has cultivated them by an application to those things which give him knowledge. So it may be said in some respects of the brute creation.

If this is true, the soul has a beginning and an end—is dependent on the breath or air, operating on the machinery to give life and action. Our breath departs, and we die. So in Adam we all die. But in Christ all are made alive—all come forth—some to life to die no more, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. The shame of having all their sins exposed, and the contempt of being banished from all God's dominions, having no place where they can be found. Being the second death, there is no hope of life or restoration to a place of residence in all the universe.

There is no necessity for the annihilation of matter for our argument. Fire decomposes wood. A part goes off in smoke, and a part falls into ashes. We don't call smoke wood or ashes wood. Death decomposes man—his breath goes forth, his mind, his thoughts, his feelings perish, come to an end, his body returns to dust. Dust was not man before he was made. The dust of man's body is not man, any more than the dust he was made of was man before he was made.

"If Christ be not raised . . . then they also who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." All depends on the resurrection of Christ. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." Some will say, with what body do they come? The apostle brings grain to illustrate his subject. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Does it all die? No, there is a germ that, if it dies, all hope of a crop is lost. What is the germ in the dead? Is it any thing that can be found in the natural man? Has the natural man an inner man that is renewed day by day? I know his old man will increase in strength as he daily performs the works of the flesh; but Paul exhorts us to put off concerning the former conversation, the old man which is corrupt . . . . and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. Is not this the germ? Moreover the Scriptures testify that, "If the spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

What is this new man? an entity separate from the one that is composed of soul, body and spirit? On the same principle that we call a person a generous soul, we call him a righteous soul, made so by the organ of reverence for the Supreme Being, and cultivating it by believing what He says, (consequently doing as he is bidden, for faith without works is dead being alone, even as the body without the spirit is dead) and that faith is imputed to him for righteousness. If this is correct, neither new man or old man is a distinct entity separate from the creature made of dust, for they are produced by the union of body and spirit-breath.

A dark gloom hangs over the condition of the wicked dead. That they will have a resurrection seems plainly taught by Christ. John 5: 28, 29. "For the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Neither can a second death be inflicted until there is a resurrection from the first death. Who will think it a small affair to have the wicked start to life again, and come in the same character they sustained when they went down into the grave, enemies of God, of his Son, of his people, of his truth? Does any one ask, Why not let them remain? How can God sustain his character as a righteous Being in letting that vile hypocrite, who was thought very good by many, remain in darkness, and not be raised and brought to an account? Paul says, "So then shall every one of us give an account of himself to God."

In the light of the world to come every thing will be made manifest; no sin will be forgotten. Christ will be Judge, who needeth not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man."

The Master praises! what are men?

Go, labor on! enough, enough,
If Jesus praise thee—if he deign
To notice e'en thy willing mind,
No toil for him shall be in vain.

Go, labor on! thy hands are weak,
Thy knees are faint, thy soul cast down;
Yet falter not, the prize is near—
The throne, the kingdom, and the crown.

See thousands dying at thy side—
Thy brethren, kindred, friends at home;
See millions perishing afar—
Haste, brethren! to the rescue come!

Toil on, toil on! thou soon shalt find
For labor rest, for exile home:
Soon shalt thou hear the Bridegroom's voice,
The midnight peal, "Behold, I come!"

A Name.

"Must have a name?" What for? "O, to distinguish us." Who from? The devil's children? Your works ought to do that. "God's children?" What for? So that you can build a little sectarian pen and do what you can to hinder the accomplishment of Jesus' prayer—"That they may all be ONE"—"one flock and one shepherd?" "Want to be separate." What for? So that those that see you coming will say, "mad dog," and honest christians will shut their ears to the truth, for fear you are going to proselyte them to some sect? But what name shall we take? The Bible has several, such as Brethren, Believers, Saints, Christians, Disciples, etc. "Now tell us which, for we prefer to be called Adventists." Yes, yes, the Bible gives plenty of names, expressive and appropriate, all of them. We dont know which to take among so many, so we wont have EITHER, but will go and hatch one up that the prophets, apostles and patriarchs never heard of, and that God has never given us. And we'll say its necessary for us to have this new name, because the Bible has a dozen, and we dont know WHICH to take; we are not willing to have all of them occasionally, as the apostles did, so we wont have either of them, but go to work and make a new one for theological wiseacres to quarrel over, as to whom it belongs and try to push one another out of possession of it.

Yes, if you have a new gospel, that no one else ever heard of, different from that of Jesus, and Paul, and Peter, and John, and ancient Christians, then by all means have a new name for it—no matter what—only before you decide on the new Gospel, name, etc., read Gal. 1: 8. But if the old Gospel will answer, why will not the old name, given by God at Antioch, answer to designate it? Let us be Christians.

Letters Illustrative of Christian Experience.—No. 17.

MY DEAR SISTER:—It is often the case that even the soul that is wholly in submission to the will of God, has its days of barrenness and desolation. Clouds are about the throne, so that prayer cannot seemingly pierce through. The Bible affords no delight, and in vain its pages are turned over, in search of something to interest and edify. Faith seems to be dormant, and no longer grasps the blessing. Hope folds her wings, and the spirit sinks in utter despondency. Love no longer feasts her eyes on Christ; she no longer sees in him transcendent loveliness; no longer rejoices in his presence. And now is the time for one of Satan's specious devices. He seeks to lead the individual to cast away his confidence—to doubt his acceptance—and, by the indulgence of unbelief, to lose the shield by which all of his fiery darts are quenched.

"You have been deceived."—"You are fallen from grace."—"If you were wholly consecrated to God, you would not have such feelings as these," are no unfrequent temptations. Sometimes, to add to the speciality of his suggestions, he will inject into the mind various vain and foolish thoughts; he will often fill the mind with impatient, proud, enviable, malicious, and even blasphemous thoughts, and so powerfully operate upon the individual's mind, as to prevent for a time all resistance; he seems to have such a grasp upon it, that the individual has no power to ward off the temptations. He forces them upon him, and then endeavors to make him believe that they originate from his own evil heart—that they are the offspring of a corrupt, unsanctified nature. But as soon as the sanctified heart is released in a measure from the power of the temptation—as soon as the submissive will can have freedom to operate—how quickly does it repel [illegible] pathize with the tempted one! She [illegible] a time when, on her way to church, the temptation to pride and to walk affectedly, took powerful hold upon her. It seemed as though there was a grasp upon her body, forcing her thus to do. The matter was forgotten during the services, but as soon as she knelt in her chamber to pray, as was her custom after returning from the house of God, she was instantly met by the suggestion—"How proud you felt, and how affectedly you walked on your way to meeting, and now think to pray!" The cloven foot was discovered; the reply was—"Thou art Satan; get thee behind me!" He fled—the dark shadow was gone—light shone—the confidence was not cast away, and prayer winged its way to heaven!

Well does she recollect five dreadful weeks of conflict, when the soul, faint, weary and disheartened, was well nigh ready to yield her all-conquering shield, and in utter despair cry out, "O God! thou hast indeed forsaken me!" Each wily suggestion had been promptly withstood until the last—it was this; "If you had done right in imputing these suggestions to Satan, God would have manifested his approval long ere this, and not permitted you to remain so long destitute of his sensible presence." How exceedingly specious was this temptation—it really appeared plausible; she looked at it; she pondered it o'er in her mind, and, half yielding to its influence, left to seek help from a devoted sister. "O, sister P——," she exclaimed, "I fear that I am backsliding!" "I hope not," said sister P. She then told her all about it; but, finding that the utterance of that unbelieving sentence had changed the "heaviness," caused by "manifold temptations," into darkness, she thought it best to retrace her steps; and, while every feeling was against what she now uttered, she made a desperate effort to grasp her falling shield by saying this; "I will, with my present feelings, submit to God, and I believe that Jesus saves me just now!" Her shield was regained—light shone upon her heart—the witness came, and now with a feeling soul she exclaimed, "Praise the Lord! Jesus saves me just now!" She hastened home, and to her chamber, to pour out her thanksgiving before the Lord; but as she knelt, the dark cloud enveloped her, and Satan whispered, "where are all of your good feelings now? They were all imaginary, and you are just where you were before." Mightily did that sister cry to God, and as the poet has expressed it:—

"In hope believing against hope,
Self-desperate, I believe."

So did she believe, and Satan vanquished, fled, and the clouds poured down rain abundantly upon her thirsty soul. For weeks she bathed in an ocean of light, love, peace and joy, and how plainly she saw the propriety of trusting God in the darkest hour.

Is God Every Body, and Every Body God?

From Fables of Infidelity, published by Hastings. Price 75 cents.

Pantheism is that perversion of reason and language which denies God's personality, and calls some imaginary soul of the world, or the world itself, by his name. While Pantheists are fully agreed upon the propriety of getting rid of a God who could note their conduct, and call them to account for it hereafter, and who would claim to exercise any authority over them here, they are by no means agreed, either in India, Germany, or America, as to what they shall call by his name. Public opinion necessitates them to say they believe in a God, but almost every one has his own private opinion as to what it is. We shall speak of it as we hear it pronounced from the lips of its prophets, here, as well as in the writings of its expounders, in Europe and Asia. Some of them declare, that it is some absolutely unknown cause of all the phenomena of the universe, and others, that it is the universe itself. A large class speak of it as the great soul of the world, while the more materialistic regard it as the world itself, body and soul; the soul being the source of all the imponderable forces, such as gravitation, heat, light, electricity, magnetism, galvanism, vegetable and animal life, and especially the mesmeric influence, of which many of them regard intellect as a modification; and the body being the sum of all the ponderable substances, such as air, water, earth, minerals, vegetables, and bodies of animal and men. This creed is popularly expressed in the sentence so often heard, "God is every thing, and every thing is God." But this vast generalization of all things into the higher unity—this exalting of monkeys, men, snails, and paving stones to the same level of divinity—by no means meets the views of the more unphilosophical and aspiring gods and goddesses, for the very [illegible] distinction? This leveling [illegible] generally confined to the German Pantheists, of whom there are multitudes in this city. Their more ambitious American brethren ascribe the contented humility which accepts it, to the continual influence of the fumes of tobacco and lager beer. Man—the soul of man—is the great divinity of our American Pantheists. "The doctrine of the soul—first soul, and second soul, and evermore soul" *—is the doctrine which is to regenerate the world. God, in their view, is nothing till he attains self-consciousness in man. "The universal does not attract us till housed in the individual. Who heeds the waste abyss of possibility? Standing on the bare ground, my head bathed by the blithe air, and uplifted into infinite space, all mere egotism vanishes. The currents of the universe being circulate through me, I am part or particle of God." "I stand here to say, 'Let us worship the mighty and transcendent soul.'" * "God attains to self-consciousness only in the human soul." "Honor yourself." "Reverence your own individuality." "The soul of man is the highest intelligence in the universe." Such are the dogmas which, under the name of Positive Philosophy, are poured forth oracularly, unsupported by reason or argument, by the prophets of the new dispensation—the last and highest achievement of the human intellect.

It is very unfortunate, however, for the honor of the prophets of the nineteenth century, that this profound discovery was invented and illustrated, patented and peddled, by the Hindoos, among the people of India, two thousand years before the divinity had struggled into self-consciousness in the mighty and transcendent souls of Schelling, Hegel, and Strauss—of Atkinson, Parker, or Emerson. We mean to show in this lecture, that it is an Antiquated, Hypocritical, Demoralizing Atheism.

1. Pantheism is an Antiquated Heresy. It has rotted and putrified among the worshipers of cats and monkeys, and holy bulls, and bits of sticks and stones, on the banks of the Ganges, for more than two thousand years; yet it is now hooked up out of its dunghill, and hawked about among christian people, as a prime new discovery of modern philosophy for getting rid of Almighty God. As the Hindoo Shasters are undoubtedly the sources from which French, German and American philosophers have borrowed their dogmas, without leave or acknowledgment; and as is generally the case with depredators, they have not had time to take the whole system, we shall gratify and edify the public by a view of this sublime theology, as exhibited in the writings of the Positive Philosophers of India.

"When existing in the temporary imperfect state of Sagun, Brahm (the Pantheist deity) wills to manifest the universe. For this purpose he puts forth his omnipotent energy, which is variously styled in the different systems now under review. He puts forth his energy for what? For the effecting of a creation out of nothing? 'No,' says one of the Shasters, but to 'produce from his own divine substance a multiform universe.' By the spontaneous exertion of this energy he sends forth, from his own divine [illegible] a countless host of essences, like innumerable sparks issuing from the blazing fire, or myriads of rays from the resplendent sun. These detached portions of Brahm—these separated divine essences—soon become individuated systems, destined, in time, to occupy different forms prepared for their reception; whether these be fixed or movable, animate or inanimate, forms of god or men, forms of animal, vegetable, or mineral existences."

"Having been separated from Brahm in his imperfect state of Sagun, they carry along with them a share of those principles qualities and attributes that characterise that state, though predominating in very different degrees and proportions: either according to their respective capacities, or the retributive awards of an eternal ordination. Amongst others it is specially noted, that as Brahm at that time had awakened into a consciousness of his own existence, there does inhere in each separated soul a notion, or a conviction, of its own distinct independent, individual existence. Laboring under this delusive notion, or conviction, the soul has lost the knowledge of its own proper nature—its divine origin and ultimate destiny. It ignorantly regards itself as an inferior entity, instead of knowing itself to be what it truly is; a consubstantial, though it may be an infinitesimally minute portion of the great whole, a universal spirit.

"Each individual soul being thus [illegible] to be [illegible] had no beginning or birth, though its separate individuality originated in time. [illegible] is eternal a parte post; it will have no end—no death; though its separate individuality will terminate in time. [illegible] manifestation in time is not a creation; it is an effluence from the eternal fountain spirit. Its disappearance from the stage of time is not an extinction of essence—a reduction to nonentity; it is only a refluence into its original source. As an emanation from the supreme, eternal spirit, it [illegible] from everlasting to everlasting. Neither can it be said to be of finite dimension; on the contrary, says the sacred oracle, 'being identified with the Supreme Brahm, it participates in his infinity.'

"After having enumerated all the elementary principles, atoms and qualities, successively evolved from Brahm, one of the sacred writings states, that though each of these had distinct powers, yet they existed separate and disunited, without order or harmonious adaptation of parts; that until they were duly combined together, it was impossible to produce this universe [illegible] animated beings; and that therefore it was requisite to adopt other means than fortuitous chance for giving them an appropriate combination and symmetrical arrangement. The Supreme, accordingly, produced an egg in which the elementary principles might be deposited, and nurtured into maturity. "All the primary atoms, qualities and principles—the seeds of future worlds—that had been evolved from the substance of Brahm, were now collected together, and deposited in the newly produced egg. And into it, along with them, entered the self-existent himself, under the assumed form of Brahma; and then he sat vivifying, expanding, and combining the elements, a whole year of the creation, or four thousand and three hundred millions of solar years. During this amazing period, the wondrous egg floated like a bubble on the abyss of primeval waters, increasing in size, and blazing refulgent as a thousand suns. At length the Supreme, who dwelt therein, burst the shell of the stupendous egg, and issued forth under a new form, with a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, a thousand arms. Along with him there issued forth another form, huge and measureless. What could that be? All the elementary principles having now been matured, and disposed into an endless variety of orderly collocations, and combined into one harmonious whole, they started into visible manifestation under the form of the present glorious universe! A universe finished, and ready made, with [illegible] apparatus of earth, sun, moon and [illegible] What, then, is this multiform [illegible] It is but a [illegible]

* Emerson.

[illegible] of primordial principles and qualities. And whence are these? Educed or evolved from the divine substance of Brahm. Hence it is that the universe is so constantly [illegible] as a manifested form of Brahm himself, the supreme, invisible spirit. Hence, too, under the notion that it is the manifestation of a being who may assume every variety of corporeal form, is the universe often personified, or [illegible] were only the different members of a person, of prodigious magnitude, in human form. It is declared that the hairs of his body are the trees of the forest; of his head, the clouds; of his beard, the lightning. His breath is the circling atmosphere; his voice, the thunder; his eyes, the sun and moon; his veins, the rivers; his nails, the rocks; his bones, the lofty mountains!" *

"The substantial fabrics of all worlds having now been framed and fitted up as the destined abodes of different orders of being, celestial, terrestrial, and infernal, the [illegible] arises, How or by whom were produced the various organised forms which these orders of being were designed to animate? Though hosts of subtle essences or souls flowed forth from Brahm, all of these remain inactive till united to some form of materialism. From this necessity the gods themselves are not exempted. While the souls of men, and other inferior spirits, must be encased in tabernacles fashioned out of the grosser elements, the souls of the gods, and all other superior spirits, must be made to inhabit material forms, composed of one or other of the infinitely attenuated and invisible rudimental atoms that spring direct from the principle of consciousness."

"Interminable as are the incoherencies, inconsistencies, and extravagancies of the Hindoo sacred writings, on no subject, perhaps, is the multiplicity of varying accounts and discrepancies more astonishing than on the present. Volumes could not suffice to detail them all. Brahma's first attempts at the production of the forms of animated beings, were as eminently unsuccessful as they were various. At one time he is said to have performed a long and severe course of ascetic devotions, to enable him to accomplish his wish; but in vain; at another, inflamed by anger and passion at his repeated failures, he sat down and wept; and from the streaming tears [illegible] sprang into being, as his first boon, a progeny of ghosts and [illegible] ear, a fourth from his side. But [illegible] such monstrous legends." †

"Feed the Flock of God."

These words set forth the duty of him who professes to be a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. In addition to warning the impenitent, which, of course, is a part of the duty of ministers of the gospel, they have taken the high responsibility to "feed the flock of God." In other words, it is their business to impart instruction, explaining and enforcing the Bible in all its parts —to administer encouragement, persuasion, consolation, reproof, and tender entreaty, to all those who belong to Christ's "little flock."

But let us inquire, what is it to "feed the flock of God?" We hear it said that "present truth" (i. e., the coming of Christ) is the food, and all the food which they require. "This," says one, "is meat in due season;" and "sanctification," he continues, "and such like doctrines, are not now calculated to build up the children of God, and should not therefore be preached." As though the simple proclamation of our Lord's immediate return to earth—transcendently glorious as such an event may be—were of itself sufficient to fit men for the coming kingdom!

Now I freely admit this is a grand, and glorious, and soul-stirring doctrine; probably more all-absorbing than any other ever made known to mortal. But does not the Bible contain other doctrines? And is it not the business of Christ's ambassador to "bring forth out of the treasury of the Lord things new and old?" See Matt. 13: 52. Where is the great doctrine of the Atonement, embracing the incarnation, life, character, sufferings and death of the Son of God, without a vital interest in which, not an individual of the human race can ever be saved in the kingdom of God? Where are the multiplied moral teachings of Christ and his Apostles, with which the minds of God's children need to be continually stirred up?

Hobby-horse riding, so called, has ever been the curse of the church, nor is it less so in these last days. We hear Paul charging Timothy thus; "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Says Jesus, and also Moses, "Man shall not live by bread alone," (by the comforts and indulgences of this world,) "but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." [illegible] then, is "meat in due season," [illegible] the church of God should be [illegible] the present awful crisis, standing as we do on the very verge of the great day of the Lord? I am sure, then to nourish the "household," is to possess all the great truths of Inspiration, as one harmonious whole; giving, of course, all due prominence to its great crowning doctrine—the immediate coming of the Lord. This latter should invite the preacher of the gospel to the greater faithfulness in the discharge of his duty, and give earnestness and pungency to his appeals in behalf of his Master. It should fire up his soul with zeal, and energy, and ardor, while he presents a full gospel, and urges men to believe its doctrines and obey its precepts; and thus be holy, in heart and life; which is the all-important prerequisite to be able to meet the Lord in peace.

The Resurrection.—Pharisees.

"The Pharisees confess that there is to be a resurrection from the dead; and, 2nd, that there are angels and spirits. But according to Josephus, this resurrection of theirs was no more than a Pythagorean resurrection—that is, a resurrection of the soul only, by its transmigration into another body, and being born anew with it!" (But from this, the worst of the wicked were deprived, and went at once to eternal torment, while the less guilty were punished in the next body, into which the soul was sent.—John 9; Matt. 16: 14.) These two cases "prove what Josephus saith—that the resurrection held by the Jews in those times was no more than the Pythagorean resurrection of the same soul, into another body."—Prideaux's Con. II., p. 223.

The Pharisees "say that all souls are incorruptible; but that the souls of good men are only removed into other bodies; but that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment."—Josephus' Wars, Book II., ch. 8, § 14.

"The place where the spirit of the righteous abide, the Jews call Paradise; the place where the wicked are shut up, they call Tartarus, after the Greeks."—Macknight; 1 Cor. 15: 55.

Those who are "willfully ignorant" as to such facts, will not be likely to believe the plain word of the Lord, as to man's mortality; or his real, personal resurrection, at the last day. But those who are willing to take the word of God and corres[illegible] Protestants borrowed it from the Papists, Papists from the Pharisees, Pharisees from Platonists or Pythagoreans, and they from the DEVIL!

"The world lying in the wicked one" has imbibed the tempter's first and pre-eminent falsehood.—Gen. 3. The glaring "lie" of satan (John 8: 44,) seduced Eve and Adam to sin—and to death. Yet "the rulers of the darkness of this world"—Pagans, Pharisees, Papists, popular theorists, Shakers and spirit rappers, (and a few Adventists)—imagine that the universality of their opinion is a demonstration of its truth. Did the general apostasy and idolatry of Israel make the golden calf of Aaron the Living God! Does almost universality in evil make that evil good!

The tempter's "snare" was first set with this charming bait—"Ye shall not surely die. . . Ye shall be as gods!" Then what satan so said, the Pythagoreans and Pharisees in imagination did! This flattering bait is still as taking as ever, so that the loss of Paradise, the abominations of heathen philosophers, of Pharisees, Papists and their followers "in the snare" are all of no avail, to deter others. On they go in "the broad way"—making and loving a lie—to "destruction." "All kindreds, tongues and nations," save a few, worshiped the beast! Was the beast, therefore, the proper object of worship? Alas! alas! for the poor people, when the professed ministers of "Christ, our Life," are themselves "taken in the snare of the devil"—which brought certain death, even to the primeval pair in Paradise! The Pharisees, as such, were great sinners, that could not "escape the damnation of hell!" Let us beware.

How profound the darkness—how dreadful the delusion—that prompts any to quote such Pharisaic folly, as if it could possibly save or approach "the truth." I can but "sigh and cry" over these killing, but prevailing, sins. The sin that forfeited Eden, that cast out the heathen, that brought wrath to the uttermost on the Pharisees, is now pre-eminent among Papists and Protestants. God's word, "surely die," is made "not surely die." Thus the most deadly sin of all past ages is exalted and enthroned as true philosophy, and pure religion.

Great God of grace, have compassion on us, or we perish! O, rend the veil that blinds the nations!—Isa. 25: 7, 8. Let Jesus come. Amen.

PRAYER.—"Where do you find a place to pray in?" was asked of a pious sailor on board a whaling ship. "Oh," he said, "I can always find a quiet spot at the mast-head."

"Sam, do you find a spot for secret prayer?" asked a minister of a stable-boy. "Oh yes, sir; that old coach is my closet, and it is the best spot on earth." Where there is a heart to pray, it is easy enough to find a place.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1859.

Practical Spiritualism.

There has been much said among Spiritualists about a "new social reform." This important reform begins to develop itself in various parts of our land. The following extracts are from The Spiritual Telegraph, published by Charles Partridge, New York, and is one of the oldest and most important Spiritual papers. It is due to the editor, to say that he does not endorse the sentiments contained in the extracts from the article published in the paper, but many others give them a hearty sanction.

It appears that John M. Spear, the noted medium, through whom the contents of the "Educator," a book of 680 pp., was communicated to this world from the spirits, has become the father of an illegitimate child. J. M. Sterling has written, and published in the Telegraph, two articles in defense of J. M. Spear and the mother of the child, whose name we withhold. Mr. Sterling says:—

"Suppose, then, Miss H. has become a mother—does that fact warrant you in calling Mr. Spear a libertine or debauchee? May he not, after all, have acted in this affair in perfect consistency with all his past life—a pure, good man? Again, does this fact of Miss H.'s maternity necessarily imply wrong or corruption in the 'Movement?'"

The word "Movement" has reference to the "new social reform," sometimes called the "Unitary Household," or, in other words, the "Free love institution." In speaking of the laws of the land, which are denominated "legalism," the article says:—

"Legalism, so far as it fetters the body or highest aspirations of the mind, must be trampled under foot, and a high and holy freedom must take their places."

Mr. Sterling goes on to say:—

"It seems to me that the time has come for action. Many are the noble women who have dared, through obloquy and reproach, to proclaim their right to be free, and in earnest and plaintive tones demanded this freedom of their legal and self-constituted lords; but it is reserved for this our day, under the inspiration of the Spirit-world, for a quiet, equable, retiring woman to rise up in the dignity of her womanhood, and declare in the face of her oppressors and a scowling world, I will be free! God help[illegible] state shall withhold from me the realization of that purest of all inspirations inherent in every true woman, the right to re-beget myself when, and by whom, and under such circumstances as to me seems fit and best."

Here you have the famous "new social reform" clearly defined. Mothers, if you would have your daughters kept from prostitution, tell them to beware of Spiritualism. Virtue is unsafe amid the "passional attractions" of those influenced by the demoniacal spirits, whose only object is to lead innocence into vice and ruin.

In commenting on the course pursued by Miss H., Mr. Sterling says:—

"This, sir, is the attitude assumed and carried out by Miss H., without consultation with, or the knowledge of, any being save her God and the one whose heart and sympathies were in unison with her own. She desired to be the mother of a child; . . . . but she was not willing to become a legal wife, in which relation she might be compelled not only to give birth to unwelcome children, but also to yield her body to the gratification of unhallowed passion. Now, sir, will you, believing this, condemn such conduct? I can not—will not! I deem it a matter with her own soul, and the one she loved, and her God, with whom she is at peace. The smiles of Heaven have been upon her; her religious nature has been greatly blessed; her spiritual vision has been unfolded, and her prospects of health and happiness, and especially of usefulness to her race, greatly augmented, and she feels to bless God that strength and courage have been given her to walk thus calmly, deliberately, and peacefully in a path ignored by a corrupt and unappreciative world; but approved by her own conscience and the smiles of bright and pure and exalted Spiritual Intelligences, who constantly surround her with their beautiful and happyfying influences."

In a letter to a friend, Miss H. writes:—

"I am acted upon most wonderfully; power is given me to walk with great rapidity, and exercise in other ways, when I myself had not strength to rise from my chair without help. This telling others of what is done in and through you, is not to them experience, and perhaps is not of much value. The good God has given me strength to say that I'll do the right as fast as it is made known to me, so that I am calm, quiet, anxious about nothing. . . Passages of Scripture are almost constantly coming to my mind, and are beautifully interpreted."

It will be recollected that the Spiritualist's God is not a being, but a principle, hence, no more is feared or obeyed, than electricity, or attraction.

Mr. Spear, the father of the child, in correspondence with a friend, in relation to Miss H., says:—

"Ere this, Bro. H. has told you how Carrie (Miss H.) is being developed physically and mentally, and her spiritual vision unfolded. It would do your soul good to hear her talk. What I have most devoutly prayed for has come, viz., her deep religious nature has been reached, and she is a praying, hoping, trusting woman. In due time she will stand at the head of our educational institution. . . . At times my heart overflows with gratitude. I am willing to endure hardship, reproach, scorn, abuse. None of these things move me."

In commenting on Spiritualism, Mr. Sterling says:—

"The day is not distant when it will control the destiny of this nation, and I may add, of all the nations of the earth."

In speaking of the "Union movement," or the "Free love institution," he says it it may be called "a child of heaven; if it is, it cannot be defeated." In conclusion, he says:—

"What then, let me inquire, is the foundation of your objection to this one of the principles in the "Union movement," viz., The right of woman, alone, to decide as to maternity? Will you say it contravenes the law of marriage? We reply, by no means! What is marriage? Is it not, as understood, and believed, and proclaimed, by all intelligent Spiritualists, to be a union of hearts—a blending of souls? Is there anything outside of this, true marriage? This, we contend, is divine marriage, and am sure you will not dissent to the proposition. If, then, it is divine, is the assent of a third party necessary to make it right?"

At a convention of Spiritualists, held in Kiantone, a resolution was passed, containing the following:—"The time has fully come when the wants of the world demand a new church, a new state, and new social and educational institutions; and that it is our purpose, acting in conjunction with what we believe to be wise and beneficent beings in the Spirit life, to inaugurate such as shall bless and redeem humanity."

We think we begin to see what kind of a "redemption," "new church," "state," "social and educational institutions," we are to expect from Spiritualism. When established, if ever, the days of Sodom's wickedness will be fully come. The "seducing spirits...speaking lies in hypocrisy...forbidding to marry," which Paul says the Spirit declares shall appear "in the latter times," are now earnestly at work. Christian, gird on thine armor. Gird it firmly, and prepare for daring exploits in the name and strength of your great Leader.

Says a correspondent of the Telegraph, under the heading of "What shall we do?"

"Almost every mind, at the present time, is as unsettled as the climate in which we live. Ourselves, the world, the whole earth, seems to be in an impressional transition state. The agriculturalists, the mechanics, the business and professional men, all are discontented with their calling and condition."

"It seems to me that the reformers of this age of the world are called upon to [illegible]selves to meet an exigency to [illegible] no parallel in the annals of [illegible] appear to me [illegible]tion—a revolution of the self-sacrificing energies of our manhood—a revolution not with physical force, but with that of the mind. Brother shall struggle with brother, child with parent, and parent with child. I know not that this war shall continue seven years, or seven hundred; but if heaven is right, it shall end in the 'Golden Age!'"

Truly, these are perplexing and "perilous times," but instead of growing better, they are to "wax worse and worse." Soon it will be said, "The great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?"

Reader, are you ready?

☞ Rev. Edward White of London, whose name will be recollected in our paper two weeks ago, reports a quickening interest in the question of a future life. After naming a few details, he says:

"A hopeful opening for another introduction is about to occur. A member of Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel's church has been convinced, one of the most pious and active of people. He has thought it right to spread his views. This called up Noel, who preached against us. Bosher (my friend) wished to read an Essay in their Society on the Immortality of the Soul, (for which I had lent him Hudson to quote the passage on Silence [of the Scriptures respecting it, c. 5, §1.]) When it came to the point the deacons stepped in, closed the doors, and prevented the meeting. The whole community is in ferment. Noel will publish his sermon. I shall answer it; and the matter will draw attention through London. If it does that, it will spread..... I shall keep you au courant with the progress of affairs.

London, Feb. 21, 1859."

☞ The following sensible remarks are from Mrs. Dr. Miller Walker, Rome, N. Y. She says:—

"Woman is made helpless and dependent by her dress, wearing bonnets that afford no protection whatever for the best part of the brain and eyes, long, expansive crinoline, tight waists, bringing disease and premature death upon themselves and posterity, and unfitting herself to engage in honorable, paying employments, although woman needs just as much to clothe and feed her as man."

MAN WILL INDULGE IN POISONS.—It is stated that there are 600,000,000 of human beings who use tobacco, and that the world produces annually 1,480,000,000 lbs. of this fascinating and poisonous weed. Opium eaters number about 100,000,000. Indian hemp eaters about 150,000. Butter-nut eaters, 1000,000. Cocoa eaters 10,000,000. The value of these articles consumed, to say nothing of coffee or tea, is computed at $3,000,000,000, per annum. Suppose we add strong drink, what a frightful aggregate of expense we would show. Hard times would cease, if man would cease to poison himself.

European War.

The political horizon of Europe is lined with the double-headed war clouds of bloody revolution. It is said peace is "to be preserved by a miracle only." The preparations for war are immense. The total amount of troops in Europe is now estimated at 4,962,066; navy 1,263,222; and earnest efforts are being made to increase the number, and have all ready for immediate service. The Emperor Napoleon has decided to withdraw his troops from Italy, and the Austrians purpose to do the same. Says Bonaparte, "I have taken the resolution to abandon him (the Pope) to the chances to which the obstinacy of his government exposes him in not following my disinterested counsels." The same correspondent says that, "all persons who know the country believe that if the French troops leave Civita Vecchia, a revolution will break out in Rome, and that the 18,000 men who compose the Pontifical army will be powerless to suppress it." The chances for the Pope and his dominions are very few. It looks as though his days would soon be numbered, and, like Belshazzar, he would be weighed in the balances and "found wanting." There are strong indications that the Papal death-struggle is at hand. Her waters, like those of ancient Babylon, are drying up, and soon she will be as powerless as a ship in a dry dock. Her cup is full, and her retribution near. The "plagues" of "death, and mourning, and famine" seem hanging over this "woman drunken with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." "Strong is the Lord God who judgeth her." Yet she still says, "I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." The Pope thinks he can take care of himself, and desires the French army to retire from his dominions.

Says the Cork Constitution of March 5th:—

"If Le Nord is to be trusted, the Pope is putting his house in order; but not after the manner recommended by Lord Palmerston. Pius has no faith in 'constitutions.' Reform, whether in government or in religion, every true Pontiff hates. From Leo down the word has been an abomination, and when, at the commencement of his career, Pius was surprised into the utterance of it, he started back affrighted at the sound, and his disappointed subjects avenged themselves by insurrection. Not in reform, then, is safety to be sought, but in the multiplication of those hireling bayonets which so long served to protect his predecessors from their people. There is a politic worldly wisdom about the Popes, and when they cannot command security at home, they look for it abroad. But what a condemnation does it pronounce on their system and themselves! Sovereigns said to be the beloved of their people dare not trust themselves to that people save surrounded by a hedge of mercenary steel! Twenty thousand Swiss are stated to be the price at which Pius reckons himself safe in the city where, according to his adulators, he is adored. We cannot but think the number an exaggeration; for, for any such number where is the Papal treasury to find funds? Even ten thousand would imply that the Pope shares the apprehension of the Freeman's correspondent that the withdrawal of the French and Austrians would be followed by a red republic."

A Vienna letter, Feb. 28, in London Times, says:—"The Austrians still express their conviction that there will be a revolution as soon as the foreign troops are withdrawn from the Papal dominions. . . . It is, however, doubtful whether the native troops of his Holiness will do their duty in case of a revolution."

The relations between France and Austria are any thing but peaceful. Says a correspondent from Vienna:—

"The political horizon looks exceedingly gloomy, but still I cherish a faint hope that there will not be a general war. The views of the Emperor of Austria have become determinedly warlike, and he is much embittered against France. The Cabinet of Vienna has agreed to maintain 150,000 men to erect fortifications in all directions."

Letters from Placenza, Piedmont, "announce that the number of Austrian troops in that place was increasing daily. Almost 12,000 men had been placed on a war footing since the first of March."

A letter from Paris of the 2d inst., sent to the Cork Examiner, says:—

"Among the flood of gossip which is going the rounds of Parisian salons, I may mention the belief that if Lord Cowley's mission does not succeed, the declaration of war of France against Austria will be dated on the 11th of April. That is the anniversary of the treaty of Fontainbleau in 1814, when the Emperor Napoleon abdicated the throne. As a mere political curiosity your readers may like to see the first article of that treaty:—'His Majesty the Emperor Napoleon renounces, both for himself, his successors and ascendants, as well as for all the members of his family, all rights of sovereignty over the French empire, the kingdom of Italy and any other part of Europe.'"

"The London Herald's correspondent states that the warlike preparations on all sides show no signs of abating. In Lombardy the Austrians are working unceasingly to strengthen all their positions. Everything has been got in readiness for a campaign. The Piedmontese on their side are not idle. The fortifications of Allessandria are said to be nearly ready. The French semi-official journals announce that the Sardinian reserves are to be called under arms. Orders have been sent to Cherbourg to arm and prepare the Imperial yacht to sail 15th April. The furniture for the Imperial apartments on board is to be sent from Germany at the end of the present month. The state departments at Fontainbleau are to be got ready, and it is rumored that a visit is expected from important personages."

The latest news from France says:—

"The colonels of the French regiments are instructed to be ready to call in the men belonging to their regiments who are out on furlough. The Twenty-seventh regiment of the line has received the whole of its equipments, even to its field tents, and it is under orders to move at the shortest notice."

Says the correspondent to the Dublin Freeman's Journal:—

"I never like to speculate much on European politics as connected with the intentions of the Emperor Napoleon, because outside that personage's immediate confidants, I do not think anybody has the slightest good reason for founding an opinion. I shall tell you two facts, however, bearing upon the matter. One is, that the man in England who perhaps is best acquainted with foreign affairs, expresses his firm belief in private that the Emperor means war, and has been augmenting his navy to prevent any demonstration on our part. The second fact is, that the French government are constructing on the Mediterranean seaboard no less than one hundred and twenty gun boats. This you may rely on."

GERMANY.—The German States are fermenting with the war spirit, and seem to be preparing for the bloody conflict in company with the rest. Says the foreign correspondence:—

"The political ferment in Germany increases from day to day, and you may soon expect to hear that one or other of the second rate States has proposed in the Diet that the federal contingents be immediately placed in bereitschaft (in a state of readiness.) This government is not likely to make a motion to that effect, as it cherishes a hope that Prussia will, sooner or later, take the lead in a matter which is of such importance to the world in general, and to Germany in particular. An intelligent friend, who is now in Frankfort, informs me that the political excitement is almost as great as it was at the beginning of 1813, and adds, that if the Emperor of the French continues as he is now going on, the German sovereigns will have no choice but to coalesce against him. Thirty-nine members of the Wurtemberg Chamber have forwarded an address to the Committee of the Estates, which is the more remarkable as it expresses the opinions entertained by the German radicals on the great question of the day. The address says:—

The whole of Germany is indignant at the attentat which is being made on the peace of Europe No one is so short-sighted as not to see the object of the tremendous armaments of France. They are not made for obtaining the freedom and independence of foreign nations, but for establishing vassal States, for conquering foreign countries, and placing them under members of the Napoleonic dynasty.

After enumerating the atrocities formerly committed by the French armies in Germany, the radicals thus speak of their former persecutor:—

The interests of Austria imperatively require peace, but she understands her duty, as the most powerful State in the German Confederation, and has assumed an attitude of defence.

The paper concludes by urging that Germany should unite in arms for the defence of the country.

"STATE OF FEELING IN FRANCE.—The dates from Paris are to the 4th instant, in the evening.

The tone of the government journals was becoming still more belligerent, and the various correspondents of the London journals write as if war was likely to be the only solution of the difficulty. . . .

Preparations were being made for the arrival in France of some distinguished personage, and a hint was thrown out that it might be the Pope.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald states that the tone of the French government papers becomes more warlike every day, and in noticing Lord Brougham's statement that the present preparations of France are only to build up the drain caused by the Crimean war, asks how this is reconcilable with the fact that the horses belonging to the artillery regiment have been increased from a peace footing of 700 to 1,400?

NEW TRACT.—One of the neatest looking little tracts I have seen of late, is "The Speechless Guest at the Marriage Feast," by J. F. Cotton. It is written in his well-known interesting style, and has many points which will profit the thoughtful reader. Send for it—read it, and scatter it, and thus assist him and do yourselves good. God grant that at the wedding feast none of us may be speechless guests.

Reply to Bro. Saltonstall.

1. In regard to the power of the witnesses, the Bible is plain.

2. That the sixth trumpet is a woe trumpet is also declared.

3. We cannot be in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, unless the slaying of the witnesses is in the past.

4. To your last question, ("Are not the witnesses slain by a power that originates from the bottomless pit?") I would reply;—

Nothing is said of the origin of the beast more than this, i. e., "The beast thou sawest was and is not and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit; . . . and the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth;" hence it is the eighth beast or head—the perdition beast—the last of earth's wicked governments—the "image" beast under the guidance of the two-horned beast, that will make war on those who bear the third angel's message, but will soon wail and writhe beneath the vials of his wrath.

Should we call the first Napoleon dynasty the eighth, then its revival makes another power beyond the eighth or last. If I apprehend aright, the slaying of the witnesses is the last triumphant act of the last Antichristian government; and, mark you this fact, the harlot rides to the judgment on this eighth head, and if I mistake not, this last marriage of the harlot is about being consummated. May the Lord give us grace to witness with joyous hope the closing scenes of a sin-cursed earth.

Yours truly, H. PRATT.

For the Crisis.

A Chapter of Experience.

Although nearly a stranger to yourself, I desire the privilege of occupying a small space in your columns.

For a few years past, I have been personally known by some of the readers of the "Crisis" to be a believer in the seventh day Sabbath, obligatory at the present time. I believed, and therefore I practiced, and in honest sincerity endeavored to persuade others to do the same. But being now convinced that it is but voluntary service, i. e., not required of us by our heavenly Father, I would make an acknowledgment of it to them, and all who may have felt pained by my influence on that point. Whilst I kept it, which was, I think, more than eight years, I did it heartily unto the Lord, and the belief that it was not only well-pleasing to him, but absolutely required, rendered it easy, and its services were a delight. No personal inconveniences nor pecuniary sacrifices were then felt to be burdensome, but, when seen in the gospel glass to be self-imposed, became a yoke not easily borne.

About one year since my reflections were stirred by its being seriously said to me, "Sister, you are under the law, you have the spirit of the law." I replied, "I think I have not; I trust for salvation simply in the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ." It was answered, "You do not know it; but you certainly have a legal spirit, and once a week you return to the arms of the 'old husband.'" This led me to a watchful examination, and I found it was even so; once a week I did thus return, and the very spirit of the law requirements rested upon me. This I knew was not in accordance with the gospel. I then endeavored to divest myself of this "do and live" spirit; but without it, I soon deeply felt that the observance of the day, separate from the means of grace I might use upon it, was indeed but an outward form—a shadow whose good things were already come, and the substance of which was richly tendered to my enjoyment.

The painful inquiry was pressed home, have I been wrong? Is it indeed not required? The result was, a more careful examination of the New Testament teachings, I think with a sincere desire to let them have their full bearing, not having first established a point, and then seeking to reconcile them to it. By thus searching I saw a force to them I never felt before—a fullness in the gospel that required in no sense the especial observance of days and months, and times and years, or even of a day, in itself considered, that is, distinct from the physical, social and moral benefits derived from rest, assembling together and instruction. But that Christ was all and in all to the believer; to put on Christ, have Christ formed within the hope of glory, dwelling richly in the heart by faith, His spirit as a well of water within, springing up continually unto eternal life, and causing its blessed fruits, love, joy, peace, etc., to abound in our daily life and conversation,—hiding ourselves under the panoply of his perfect righteousness—trusting alone to the full merit of his complete atonement; having a clearer view of this, I could but esteem the keeping of any day, as I had kept the seventh, incompatible with the gospel of Christ.

But my soul was deeply humiliated, and I felt that henceforth, if I had faith, I would have it to myself before God. Still I think a more general acknowledgment of my error on this point is due—especially with respect to that exclusive and restrictive spirit, which, as far as my observation has extended, in a greater or less degree, ever attends this faith, as it is received among us at the present time. That I participated in it, I am sorry;—sorry that I ever suffered aught, save the christian character, the mind and spirit of Christ, to be with me a test of christian fellowship.

It is now nearly one year since I have been obeying the injunction of the apostle, 1 Pet. 2: 13; "Submit yourselves," etc., and have found the means of grace, used on the first day, to be also the channels of God's love and mercy—that the same God is still my God—my present Help in time of need; that his precious love shed abroad in my heart, flows to others with earnest desire that they may find the true hiding-place—the covert from the coming storm. Such I believe Christ the Son of the living God will be, to all who put their trust in Him.

I still believe and love the evidences of his speedy coming, and the glories of his promised kingdom, the future and eternal inheritance of his people. My heart warms at the thought, blessed be God, that I ever heard and loved these soul-cheering and life-inspiring truths; and when I hear of one and another of my honest Sabbath brethren falling by the chill hand of death, I look forward to a speedy re-union with them, through Him who is the resurrection and the life, to join in ascriptions of praise,—"Unto Him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, to whom be glory and dominion forever and ever."

sion of primordial principles and qualities. And whence are these? Educed or evolved from the divine substance of Brahm. Hence it is that the universe is so constantly spoken of, even by mythologists, as a manifested form of Brahm himself, the supreme, invisible spirit. Hence, too, under the notion that it is the manifestation of a being who may assume every variety of corporeal form, is the universe often personified, or described as if its different parts were only the different members of a person, of prodigious magnitude, in human form. It is declared that the hairs of his body are the trees of the forest; of his head, the clouds; of his beard, the lightning. His breath is the circling atmosphere; his voice, the thunder; his eyes, the sun and moon; his veins, the rivers; his nails, the rocks; his bones, the lofty mountains!" *

"The substantial fabrics of all worlds having now been framed and fitted up as the destined abodes of different orders of being, celestial, terrestrial, and infernal, the question arises, How or by whom were produced the various organized forms which these orders of being were designed to animate? Though hosts of subtle essences or souls flowed forth from Brahm, all of these remain inactive till united to some form of materialism. From this necessity the gods themselves are not exempted. While the souls of men, and other inferior spirits, must be encased in tabernacles fashioned out of the grosser elements, the souls of the gods, and all other superior spirits, must be made to inhabit material forms, composed of one or other of the infinitely attenuated and invisible rudimental atoms that spring direct from the principle of consciousness."

"Interminable as are the incoherencies, inconsistencies, and extravagancies of the Hindoo sacred writings, on no subject, perhaps, is the multiplicity of varying accounts and discrepancies more astonishing than on the present. Volumes could not suffice to detail them all. Brahma's first attempts at the production of the forms of animated beings, were as eminently unsuccessful as they were various. At one time he is said to have performed a long and severe course of ascetic devotions, to enable him to accomplish his wish; but in vain; at another, inflamed by anger and passion at his repeated failures, he sat down and wept; and from the streaming tear-drops sprang into being, as his first boon, a progeny of ghosts and dre[illegible]

[illegible] ear, a fourth from his side. But enough of such monstrous legends." †

"Feed the Flock of God."

These words set forth the duty of him who professes to be a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. In addition to warning the impenitent, which, of course, is a part of the duty of ministers of the gospel, they have taken the high responsibility to "feed the flock of God." In other words, it is their business to impart instruction, explaining and enforcing the Bible in all its parts—to administer encouragement, persuasion, consolation, reproof, and tender entreaty, to all those who belong to Christ's "little flock."

But let us inquire, what is it to "feed the flock of God?" We hear it said that "present truth" (i. e., the coming of Christ) is the food, and all the food which they require. "This," says one, "is meat in due season;" and "sanctification," he continues, "and such like doctrines, are not now calculated to build up the children of God, and should not therefore be preached." As though the simple proclamation of our Lord's immediate return to earth—transcendently glorious as such an event may be—were of itself sufficient to fit men for the coming kingdom!

Now I freely admit this is a grand, and glorious, and soul-stirring doctrine; probably more all-absorbing than any other ever made known to mortal. But does not the Bible contain other doctrines? And is it not the business of Christ's ambassador to "bring forth out of the treasury of the Lord things new and old?" See Matt. 13: 52. Where is the great doctrine of the Atonement, embracing the incarnation, life, character, sufferings and death of the Son of God, without a vital interest in which, not an individual of the human race can ever be saved in the kingdom of God? Where are the multiplied moral teachings of Christ and his Apostles, with which the minds of God's children need to be continually stirred up?

Hobby-horse riding, so called, has ever been the curse of the church, nor is it less so in these last days. We hear Paul charging Timothy thus; "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Says Jesus, and also Moses, "Man shall not live by bread alone," (by the comforts and indulgences of this world,) "but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

[illegible], then, is "meat in due season," [illegible] which the church of God should be [illegible] the present awful crisis, standing as we do on the very verge of the great day of the Lord? I am sure, thus to nourish the household, is to present all the great truths of Inspiration, as one harmonious whole; giving, of course, all due prominence to its great crowning doctrine—the immediate coming of the Lord. This latter should invite the preacher of the gospel to the greater faithfulness in the discharge of his duty, and give earnestness and pungency to his appeals in behalf of his Master. It should fire up his soul with zeal, and energy, and ardor, while he presents a full gospel, and urges men to believe its doctrines and obey its precepts; and thus be holy, in heart and life; which is the all-important prerequisite to be able to meet the Lord in peace.

The Resurrection.—Pharisees.

"The Pharisees confess that there is to be a resurrection from the dead; and, 2nd, that there are angels and spirits. But according to Josephus, this resurrection of theirs was no more than a Pythagorean resurrection—that is, a resurrection of the soul only, by its transmigration into another body, and being born anew with it!" (But from this, the worst of the wicked were deprived, and went at once to eternal torment, while the less guilty were punished in the next body, into which the soul was sent.—John 9; Matt. 16: 14.) These two cases "prove what Josephus saith—that the resurrection held by the Jews in those times was no more than the Pythagorean resurrection of the same soul, into another body."—Prideaux's Con. II., p. 223.

The Pharisees "say that all souls are incorruptible; but that the souls of good men are only removed into other bodies; but that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment."—Josephus' Wars, Book II., ch. 8, § 14.

"The place where the spirit of the righteous abide, the Jews call Paradise; the place where the wicked are shut up, they call Tartarus, after the Greeks."—Macknight; 1 Cor. 15: 55.

Those who are "willfully ignorant" as to such facts, will not be likely to believe the plain word of the Lord, as to man's mortality; or his real, personal resurrection, at the last day. But those who are willing to take the word of God and corres[illegible] Protestants borrowed it from the Papists, Papists from the Pharisees, Pharisees from Platonists or Pythagoreans, and they from the DEVIL!

"The world lying in the wicked one" has imbibed the tempter's first and preeminent falsehood.—Gen. 3. The glazing "lie" of satan (John 8: 44,) seduced Eve and Adam to sin—and to death. Yet "the rulers of the darkness of this world"—Pagans, Pharisees, Papists, popular theorists, Shakers and spirit rappers, (and a few Adventists)—imagine that the universality of their opinion is a demonstration of its truth. Did the general apostasy and idolatry of Israel make the golden calf of Aaron the Living God! Does almost universality in evil make that evil good!

The tempter's "snare" was first set with this charming bait—"Ye shall not surely die. . . Ye shall be as gods!" Then what satan so said, the Pythagoreans and Pharisees in imagination did! This flattering bait is still as taking as ever, so that the loss of Paradise, the abominations of heathen philosophers, of Pharisees, Papists and their followers "in the snare" are all of no avail, to deter others. On they go in "the broad way"—making and loving a lie—to "destruction." "All kindreds, tongues and nations," save a few, worshiped the beast! Was the beast, therefore, the proper object of worship? Alas! alas! for the poor people, when the professed ministers of "Christ, our Life," are themselves "taken in the snare of the devil"—which brought certain death, even to the primeval pair in Paradise! The Pharisees, as such, were great sinners, that could not "escape the damnation of hell!" Let us beware.

How profound the darkness—how dreadful the delusion—that prompts any to quote such Pharisaic folly, as if it could possibly save or approach "the truth." I can but "sigh and cry" over these killing, but prevailing, sins. The sin that forfeited Eden, that cast out the heathen, that brought wrath to the uttermost on the Pharisees, is now pre-eminent among Papists and Protestants. God's word, "surely die," is made "not surely die." Thus the most deadly sin of all past ages is exalted and enthroned as true philosophy, and pure religion.

Great God of grace, have compassion on us, or we perish! O, rend the veil that blinds the nations!—Isa. 25: 7, 8. Let Jesus come. Amen.

PRAYER.—"Where do you find a place to pray in?" was asked of a pious sailor on board a whaling ship. "Oh," he said, "I can always find a quiet spot at the masthead."

"Sam, do you find a spot for secret prayer?" asked a minister of a stable-boy. "Oh yes, sir; that old coach is my closet, and it is the best spot on earth." Where there is a heart to pray, it is easy enough to find a place.

The World's Crisis.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1859.

Practical Spiritualism.

There has been much said among Spiritualists about a "new social reform." This important reform begins to develop itself in various parts of our land. The following extracts are from The Spiritual Telegraph, published by Charles Partridge, New York, and is one of the oldest and most important Spiritual papers. It is due to the editor, to say that he does not endorse the sentiments contained in the extracts from the article published in the paper, but many others give them a hearty sanction.

It appears that John M. Spear, the noted medium, through whom the contents of the "Educator," a book of 680 pp., was communicated to this world from the spirits, has become the father of an illegitimate child. J. M. Sterling has written, and published in the Telegraph, two articles in defense of J. M. Spear and the mother of the child, whose name we withhold. Mr. Sterling says:—

"Suppose, then, Miss H. has become a mother—does that fact warrant you in calling Mr. Spear a libertine or debauchee? May he not, after all, have acted in this affair in perfect consistency with all his past life—a pure, good man? Again, does this fact of Miss H.'s maternity necessarily imply wrong or corruption in the 'Movement?'"

The word "Movement" has reference to the "new social reform," sometimes called the "Unitary Household," or, in other words, the "Free love institution." In speaking of the laws of the land, which are denominated "legalism," the article says:—

"Legalism, so far as it fetters the body or highest aspirations of the mind, must be trampled under foot, and a high and holy freedom must take their places."

Mr. Sterling goes on to say:—

"It seems to me that the time has come for action. Many are the noble women who have dared, through obloquy and reproach, to proclaim their right to be free, and in earnest and plaintive tones demanded this freedom of their legal and self-constituted lords; but it is reserved for this our day, under the inspiration of the Spirit-world, for a quiet, equable, retiring woman to rise up in the dignity of her womanhood, and declare in the face of her oppressors and a scowling world, I will be free! God help[illegible] state shall withhold from me the realization of that purest of all inspirations inherent in every true woman, the right to re-beget myself when, and by whom, and under such circumstances as to me seems fit and best."

Here you have the famous "new social reform" clearly defined. Mothers, if you would have your daughters kept from prostitution, tell them to beware of Spiritualism. Virtue is unsafe amid the "passional attractions" of those influenced by the demoniacal spirits, whose only object is to lead innocence into vice and ruin.

In commenting on the course pursued by Miss H., Mr. Sterling says:—

"This, sir, is the attitude assumed and carried out by Miss H., without consultation with, or the knowledge of, any being save her God and the one whose heart and sympathies were in unison with her own. She desired to be the mother of a child; . . . . but she was not willing to become a legal wife, in which relation she might be compelled not only to give birth to unwelcome children, but also to yield her body to the gratification of unhallowed passion. Now, sir, will you, believing this, condemn such conduct? I can not—will not! I deem it a matter with her own soul, and the one she loved, and her God, with whom she is at peace. The smiles of Heaven have been upon her; her religious nature has been greatly blessed; her spiritual vision has been unfolded, and her prospects of health and happiness, and especially of usefulness to her race, greatly augmented, and she feels to bless God that strength and courage have been given her to walk thus calmly, deliberately, and peacefully in a path ignored by a corrupt and unappreciative world; but approved by her own conscience and the smiles of bright and pure and exalted Spiritual Intelligences, who constantly surround her with their beautiful and happyfying influences."

In a letter to a friend, Miss H. writes:—

"I am acted upon most wonderfully; power is given me to walk with great rapidity, and exercise in other ways, when I myself had not strength to rise from my chair without help. This telling others of what is done in and through you, is not to them experience, and perhaps is not of much value. The good God has given me strength to say that I'll do the right as fast as it is made known to me, so that I am calm, quiet, anxious about nothing. . . Passages of Scripture are almost constantly coming to my mind, and are beautifully interpreted."

It will be recollected that the Spiritualist's God is not a being, but a principle, hence, no more is feared or obeyed, than electricity, or attraction.

Mr. Spear, the father of the child, in correspondence with a friend, in relation to Miss H., says:—

"Ere this, Bro. H. has told you how Carrie (Miss H.) is being developed physically and mentally, and her spiritual vision unfolded. It would do your soul good to hear her talk. What I have most devoutly prayed for has come, viz., her deep religious nature has been reached, and she is a praying, hoping, trusting woman. In due time she will stand at the head of our educational institution. . . At times my heart overflows with gratitude. I am willing to endure hardship, reproach, scorn, abuse. None of these things move me."

In commenting on Spiritualism, Mr. Sterling says:—

"The day is not distant when it will control the destiny of this nation, and I may add, of all the nations of the earth."

In speaking of the "Union movement," or the "Free love institution," he says it it may be called "a child of heaven; if it is, it cannot be defeated." In conclusion, he says:—

"What then, let me inquire, is the foundation of your objection to this one of the principles in the "Union movement," viz., The right of woman, alone, to decide as to maternity? Will you say it contravenes the law of marriage? We reply, by no means! What is marriage? Is it not, as understood, and believed, and proclaimed, by all intelligent Spiritualists, to be a union of hearts—a blending of souls? Is there anything outside of this, true marriage? This, we contend, is divine marriage, and am sure you will not dissent to the proposition. If, then, it is divine, is the assent of a third party necessary to make it right?"

At a convention of Spiritualists, held in Kiantone, a resolution was passed, containing the following:—"The time has fully come when the wants of the world demand a new church, a new state, and new social and educational institutions; and that it is our purpose, acting in conjunction with what we believe to be wise and beneficent beings in the Spirit life, to inaugurate such as shall bless and redeem humanity."

We think we begin to see what kind of a "redemption," "new church," "state," "social and educational institutions," we are to expect from Spiritualism. When established, if ever, the days of Sodom's wickedness will be fully come. The "seducing spirits...speaking lies in hypocrisy...forbidding to marry," which Paul says the Spirit declares shall appear "in the latter times," are now earnestly at work. Christian, gird on thine armor. Gird it firmly, and prepare for daring exploits in the name and strength of your great Leader.

Says a correspondent of the Telegraph, under the heading of "What shall we do?"

"Almost every mind, at the present time, is as unsettled as the climate in which we live. Ourselves, the world, the whole earth, seems to be in an impressional transition state. The agriculturalists, the mechanics, the business and professional men, all are discontented with their calling and condition."

"It seems to me that the reformers of this age of the world are called upon to [illegible]lves to meet an exigency to [illegible] no parallel in the annals of [illegible] appear to me [illegible]tion—a rev[illegible] of the self-sacrificing energies of our manhood—a revolution not with physical force, but with that of the mind. Brother shall struggle with brother, child with parent, and parent with child. I know not that this war shall continue seven years, or seven hundred; but if heaven is right, it shall end in the 'Golden Age!'"

Truly, these are perplexing and "perilous times," but instead of growing better, they are to "wax worse and worse." Soon it will be said, "The great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?"

Reader, are you ready?

☞ Rev. Edward White of London, whose name will be recollected in our paper two weeks ago, reports a quickening interest in the question of a future life. After naming a few details, he says:

"A hopeful opening for another introduction is about to occur. A member of Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel's church has been convinced, one of the most pious and active of people. He has thought it right to spread his views. This called up Noel, who preached against us. Bosher (my friend) wished to read an Essay in their Society on the Immortality of the Soul, (for which I had lent him Hudson to quote the passage on Silence [of the Scriptures respecting it, c. 5, §1.]) When it came to the point the deacons stepped in, closed the doors, and prevented the meeting. The whole community is in ferment. Noel will publish his sermon. I shall answer it; and the matter will draw attention through London. If it does that, it will spread..... I shall keep you au courant with the progress of affairs.

London, Feb. 21, 1859."

☞ The following sensible remarks are from Mrs. Dr. Miller Walker, Rome, N. Y. She says:—

"Woman is made helpless and dependent by her dress, wearing bonnets that afford no protection whatever for the best part of the brain and eyes, long, expansive crinoline, tight waists, bringing disease and premature death upon themselves and posterity, and unfitting herself to engage in honorable, paying employments, although woman needs just as much to clothe and feed her as man."

MAN WILL INDULGE IN POISONS.—It is stated that there are 600,000,000 of human beings who use tobacco, and that the world produces annually 1,480,000,000 lbs. of this fascinating and poisonous weed. Opium eaters number about 100,000,000. Indian hemp eaters about 150,000. Butter-nut eaters, 1000,000. Cocoa eaters 10,000,000. The value of these articles consumed, to say nothing of coffee or tea, is computed at $3,000,000,000, per annum. Suppose we add strong drink, what a frightful aggregate of expense we would show. Hard times would cease, if man would cease to poison himself.

European War.

The political horizon of Europe is lined with the double-headed war clouds of bloody revolution. It is said peace is "to be preserved by a miracle only." The preparations for war are immense. The total amount of troops in Europe is now estimated at 4,962,066; navy 1,263,222; and earnest efforts are being made to increase the number, and have all ready for immediate service. The Emperor Napoleon has decided to withdraw his troops from Italy, and the Austrians purpose to do the same. Says Bonaparte, "I have taken the resolution to abandon him (the Pope) to the chances to which the obstinacy of his government exposes him in not following my disinterested counsels." The same correspondent says that, "all persons who know the country believe that if the French troops leave Civita Vecchia, a revolution will break out in Rome, and that the 18,000 men who compose the Pontifical army will be powerless to suppress it." The chances for the Pope and his dominions are very few. It looks as though his days would soon be numbered, and, like Belshazzar, he would be weighed in the balances and "found wanting." There are strong indications that the Papal death-struggle is at hand. Her waters, like those of ancient Babylon, are drying up, and soon she will be as powerless as a ship in a dry dock. Her cup is full, and her retribution near. The "plagues" of "death, and mourning, and famine" seem hanging over this "woman drunken with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." "Strong is the Lord God who judgeth her." Yet she still says, "I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." The Pope thinks he can take care of himself, and desires the French army to retire from his dominions.

Says the Cork Constitution of March 5th:—

"If Le Nord is to be trusted, the Pope is putting his house in order; but not after the manner recommended by Lord Palmerston. Pius has no faith in 'constitutions.' Reform, whether in government or in religion, every true Pontiff hates. From Leo down the word has been an abomination, and when, at the commencement of his career, Pius was surprised into the utterance of it, he started back affrighted at the sound, and his disappointed subjects avenged themselves by insurrection. Not in reform, then, is safety to be sought, but in the multiplication of those hireling bayonets which so long served to protect his predecessors from their people. There is a politic worldly wisdom about the Popes, and when they cannot command security at home, they look for it abroad. But what a condemnation does it pronounce on their system and themselves! Sovereigns said to be the beloved of their people dare not trust themselves to that people save surrounded by a hedge of mercenary steel! Twenty thousand Swiss are stated to be the price at which Pius reckons himself safe in the city where, according to his adulators, he is adored. We cannot but think the number an exaggeration; for, for any such number where is the Papal treasury to find funds? Even ten thousand would imply that the Pope shares the apprehension of the Freeman's correspondent that the withdrawal of the French and Austrians would be followed by a red republic."

A Vienna letter, Feb. 28, in London Times, says:—"The Austrians still express their conviction that there will be a revolution as soon as the foreign troops are withdrawn from the Papal dominions. . . . It is, however, doubtful whether the native troops of his Holiness will do their duty in case of a revolution."

The relations between France and Austria are any thing but peaceful. Says a correspondent from Vienna:—

"The political horizon looks exceedingly gloomy, but still I cherish a faint hope that there will not be a general war. The views of the Emperor of Austria have become determinedly warlike, and he is much embittered against France. The Cabinet of Vienna has agreed to maintain 150,000 men to erect fortifications in all directions."

Letters from Placenza, Piedmont, "announce that the number of Austrian troops in that place was increasing daily. Almost 12,000 men had been placed on a war footing since the first of March."

A letter from Paris of the 2d inst., sent to the Cork Examiner, says:—

"Among the flood of gossip which is going the rounds of Parisian salons, I may mention the belief that if Lord Cowley's mission does not succeed, the declaration of war of France against Austria will be dated on the 11th of April. That is the anniversary of the treaty of Fontainbleau in 1814, when the Emperor Napoleon abdicated the throne. As a mere political curiosity your readers may like to see the first article of that treaty:—'His Majesty the Emperor Napoleon renounces, both for himself, his successors and ascendants, as well as for all the members of his family, all rights of sovereignty over the French empire, the kingdom of Italy and any other part of Europe.'"

"The London Herald's correspondent states that the warlike preparations on all sides show no signs of abating. In Lombardy the Austrians are working unceasingly to strengthen all their positions. Everything has been got in readiness for a campaign.

The Piedmontese on their side are not idle. The fortifications of Allessandria are said to be nearly ready. The French semi-official journals announce that the Sardinian reserves are to be called under arms. Orders have been sent to Cherbourg to arm and prepare the Imperial yacht to sail 15th April. The furniture for the Imperial apartments on board is to be sent from Germany at the end of the present month. The state departments at Fontainbleau are to be got ready, and it is rumored that a visit is expected from important personages."

The latest news from France says:—

"The colonels of the French regiments are instructed to be ready to call in the men belonging to their regiments who are out on furlough. The Twenty-seventh regiment of the line has received the whole of its equipments, even to its field tents, and it is under orders to move at the shortest notice."

Says the correspondent to the Dublin Freeman's Journal:—

"I never like to speculate much on European politics as connected with the intentions of the Emperor Napoleon, because outside that personage's immediate confidants, I do not think anybody has the slightest good reason for founding an opinion. I shall tell you two facts, however, bearing upon the matter. One is, that the man in England who perhaps is best acquainted with foreign affairs, expresses his firm belief in private that the Emperor means war, and has been augmenting his navy to prevent any demonstration on our part. The second fact is, that the French government are constructing on the Mediterranean seaboard no less than one hundred and twenty gun boats. This you may rely on."

GERMANY.—The German States are fermenting with the war spirit, and seem to be preparing for the bloody conflict in company with the rest. Says the foreign correspondence:—

"The political ferment in Germany increases from day to day, and you may soon expect to hear that one or other of the second rate States has proposed in the Diet that the federal contingents be immediately placed in bereitschaft (in a state of readiness.) This government is not likely to make a motion to that effect, as it cherishes a hope that Prussia will, sooner or later, take the lead in a matter which is of such importance to the world in general, and to Germany in particular. An intelligent friend, who is now in Frankfort, informs me that the political excitement is almost as great as it was at the beginning of 1813, and adds, that if the Emperor of the French continues as he is now going on, the German sovereigns will have no choice but to coalesce against him. Thirty-nine members of the Wurtemberg Chamber have forwarded an address to the Committee of the Estates, which is the more remarkable as it expresses the opinions entertained by the German radicals on the great question of the day. The address says:—

The whole of Germany is indignant at the attentat which is being made on the peace of Europe. No one is so short-sighted as not to see the object of the tremendous armaments of France. They are not made for obtaining the freedom and independence of foreign nations, but for establishing vassal States, for conquering foreign countries, and placing them under members of the Napoleonic dynasty.

After enumerating the atrocities formerly committed by the French armies in Germany, the radicals thus speak of their former persecutor:—

The interests of Austria imperatively require peace, but she understands her duty, as the most powerful State in the German Confederation, and has assumed an attitude of defence.

The paper concludes by urging that Germany should unite in arms for the defence of the country.

"STATE OF FEELING IN FRANCE.—The dates from Paris are to the 4th instant, in the evening.

The tone of the government journals was becoming still more belligerent, and the various correspondents of the London journals write as if war was likely to be the only solution of the difficulty. . . .

Preparations were being made for the arrival in France of some distinguished personage, and a hint was thrown out that it might be the Pope.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald states that the tone of the French government papers becomes more warlike every day, and in noticing Lord Brougham's statement that the present preparations of France are only to build up the drain caused by the Crimean war, asks how this is reconcilable with the fact that the horses belonging to the artillery regiment have been increased from a peace footing of 700 to 1,400?

NEW TRACT.—One of the neatest looking little tracts I have seen of late, is "The Speechless Guest at the Marriage Feast," by J. F. Cotton. It is written in his well-known interesting style, and has many points which will profit the thoughtful reader. Send for it—read it, and scatter it, and thus assist him and do yourselves good. God grant that at the wedding feast none of us may be speechless guests.

Reply to Bro. Saltonstall.

1. In regard to the power of the witnesses, the Bible is plain.

2. That the sixth trumpet is a woe trumpet is also declared.

3. We cannot be in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, unless the slaying of the witnesses is in the past.

4. To your last question, ("Are not the witnesses slain by a power that originates from the bottomless pit?") I would reply:—

Nothing is said of the origin of the beast more than this, i. e., "The beast thou sawest was and is not and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit; . . . and the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth;" hence it is the eighth beast or head—the perdition beast—the last of earth's wicked governments—the "image" beast under the guidance of the two-horned beast, that will make war on those who bear the third angel's message, but will soon wail and writhe beneath the vials of his wrath.

Should we call the first Napoleon dynasty the eighth, then its revival makes another power beyond the eighth or last. If I apprehend aright, the slaying of the witnesses is the last triumphant act of the last Antichristian government; and, mark you this fact, the harlot rides to the judgment on this eighth head, and if I mistake not, this last marriage of the harlot is about being consummated. May the Lord give us grace to witness with joyous hope the closing scenes of a sin-cursed earth.

Yours truly, H. PRATT.

A Chapter of Experience.

Although nearly a stranger to yourself, I desire the privilege of occupying a small space in your columns.

For a few years past, I have been personally known by some of the readers of the "Crisis" to be a believer in the seventh day Sabbath, obligatory at the present time. I believed, and therefore I practiced, and in honest sincerity endeavored to persuade others to do the same. But being now convinced that it is but voluntary service, i. e., not required of us by our heavenly Father, I would make an acknowledgment of it to them, and all who may have felt pained by my influence on that point. Whilst I kept it, which was, I think, more than eight years, I did it heartily unto the Lord, and the belief that it was not only well-pleasing to him, but absolutely required, rendered it easy, and its services were a delight. No personal inconveniences nor pecuniary sacrifices were then felt to be burdensome, but, when seen in the gospel glass to be self-imposed, became a yoke not easily borne.

About one year since my reflections were stirred by its being seriously said to me, "Sister, you are under the law, you have the spirit of the law." I replied, "I think I have not; I trust for salvation simply in the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ." It was answered, "You do not know it; but you certainly have a legal spirit, and once a week you return to the arms of the 'old husband.'" This led me to a watchful examination, and I found it was even so; once a week I did thus return, and the very spirit of the law requirements rested upon me. This I knew was not in accordance with the gospel. I then endeavored to divest myself of this "do and live" spirit; but without it, I soon deeply felt that the observance of the day, separate from the means of grace I might use upon it, was indeed but an outward form—a shadow whose good things were already come, and the substance of which was richly tendered to my enjoyment.

The painful inquiry was pressed home, have I been wrong? Is it indeed not required? The result was, a more careful examination of the New Testament teachings, I think with a sincere desire to let them have their full bearing, not having first established a point, and then seeking to reconcile them to it. By thus searching I saw a force to them I never felt before—a fullness in the gospel that required in no sense the especial observance of days and months, and times and years, or even of a day, in itself considered, that is, distinct from the physical, social and moral benefits derived from rest, assembling together and instruction. But that Christ was all and in all to the believer; to put on Christ, have Christ formed within the hope of glory, dwelling richly in the heart by faith, His spirit as a well of water within, springing up continually unto eternal life, and causing its blessed fruits, love, joy, peace, etc., to abound in our daily life and conversation,—hiding ourselves under the panoply of his perfect righteousness—trusting alone to the full merit of his complete atonement; having a clearer view of this, I could but esteem the keeping of any day, as I had kept the seventh, incompatible with the gospel of Christ.

But my soul was deeply humiliated, and I felt that henceforth, if I had faith, I would have it to myself before God. Still I think a more general acknowledgment of my error on this point is due—especially with respect to that exclusive and restrictive spirit, which, as far as my observation has extended, in a greater or less degree, ever attends this faith, as it is received among us at the present time. That I participated in it, I am sorry;—sorry that I ever suffered aught, save the christian character, the mind and spirit of Christ, to be with me a test of christian fellowship.

It is now nearly one year since I have been obeying the injunction of the apostle, 1 Pet. 2: 13; "Submit yourselves," etc., and have found the means of grace, used on the first day, to be also the channels of God's love and mercy—that the same God is still my God—my present Help in time of need; that his precious love shed abroad in my heart, flows to others with earnest desire that they may find the true hiding-place—the covert from the coming storm. Such I believe Christ the Son of the living God will be, to all who put their trust in Him.

I still believe and love the evidences of his speedy coming, and the glories of his promised kingdom, the future and eternal inheritance of his people. My heart warms at the thought, blessed be God, that I ever heard and loved these soul-cheering and life-inspiring truths; and when I hear of one and another of my honest Sabbath brethren falling by the chill hand of death, I look forward to a speedy re-union with them, through Him who is the resurrection and the life, to join in ascriptions of praise, —"Unto Him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, to whom be glory and dominion forever and ever."

"Living Soul."

Who is a "living soul?" Man. How did he become a living soul? "The Lord God . . . breathed into his nostrils the breath of life," or, as the margin reads, "the breath of lives." But stop, sir. God breathed into man a living soul, and that soul is immortal. It will never die; it cannot die, and it will live in heaven or hell to all eternity. Please pause and reflect, sir, a moment. Go back with me to the record, and read the whole text. Gen. 2: 7—"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." That is the Bible statement of the case. Does it say the Creator put an immortal soul into the man? Does it say anything about God's putting into man, or man's body, a living soul? No. But man became a living soul by or through the breath of life being breathed into him. That alters the case materially. Certainly. Its materiality you have to do with. Now you are in a fair way to see the truth. We'll reflect back again. Of what was man "framed," created or made? "Of the dust of the ground." That is right, now don't forget it. How did this literal, material man become a living soul? "The Lord God breathed into his [man's] nostrils," not an immortal soul, nor a living soul, but "the breath of life, and MAN became a LIVING SOUL." It was the breath of life, then, that made or caused something else a living soul—and that was man. How easy to be understood! The learned and inspired Paul gives us the same definition of "living soul" as above. "The first man, Adam, was made a living soul."

Thus, we see, the primary definition of the term, "living soul," is the whole man. That it may have secondary definitions I shall not undertake to deny. In the above view of the case, how natural and easy the explanation of such passages as Eccl. 12: 7—"Then," in death, "shall the dust," out of which man was made, "return to the earth as it was," before organic existence and life; "and the spirit," "breath of life" "shall return to God who gave it."

The above text is a fac-simile representative reversal of the modus operandi of creation. But what blinds the reader's mind, is the ghostly definition Doctors of Divinity put to the words, "the spirit." They force out of that term an immortal soul, when soul is not lisped in the text at all, much less an immortal one! This is theological addition—an addition that has puzzled every theological student in christendom. And why? Because it is not Bible, nor reason. It is the result of the mystical principle of interpretation. It was introduced into the world soon after the Creator said to man, if he did so and so, he should "surely die." The serpent—the devil—soon after the announcement of this truth, in the moral world, preached to Adam and Eve—"Ye shall not surely die," as an antidote to what God had threatened man in case his just and holy law was violated.

To state the case in plain English, satan gave God the lie; and, while I am writing plain English, I will just say that, in my opinion, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is only a modification of—"Ye shall not surely die." Now who told the truth, the Creator or satan? You all say God did. That is right. Now just hold to that, and we will soon be done. Well, if God said the truth, then the soul is not immortal, for immortality cannot "surely die." But "the soul that sinneth, IT" the soul "shall die:" and "the wages of sin is death." It must be so. The soul is not immortal, and therefore it can die.

My dying friends, seek eternal life in Jesus, or you die to all eternity.

The Blessed Dead.

"Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors."

Yes, truly blessed are they that sleep in Jesus, and not only blessed because they rest from their labors, but they rest forever safe from sin's polluting touch. They rest from sorrow, aches, and all the secret griefs to which mortality is subject. I cannot wonder when I hear a pilgrim, after passing nights of weary, painful tossings upon his bed, almost a stranger to sleep that brings rest; I cannot wonder to hear such an one exclaim, O, that I might rest in the grave till Jesus comes! and yet the cause of God is so near his heart that he can say, not my will, but thine, O God, be done! He views the world, white already for harvest, but how few real laborers. He sees the church depending almost wholly upon the preacher to perform the labors of the church, not once feeling the responsibility resting upon them individually, of staying up the preacher's hands by their prayers and exhortations, private and public.

O! the work is so great, and so few to act in the great work of God, that I fear others must rest in the grave before the time for the eternal rest to begin. My brother, sister, shall we be indolent and ease-loving, while others are active and self-denying? Shall we be careless, while others are all worn down with care? Shall we refuse to labor and act for God in our humble sphere, while others refuse not to act anywhere the Spirit directs? No, no: when we cease to bear others' burdens, we cease to have a Christ-like character. Except we have this character, we need not expect a home in the Kingdom of God.

I have often asked myself the question why the blessing was offered from henceforth. May it not be on account of the Spirit's looking down to the persecution that would arise, and seeing the perils that would exist, the evil influences that would surround, and at the same time viewing poor, weak human nature, which always remains the same.

Well, it is blessed to think of resting in the Lord, but a more blessed state is brought to view in the book of God, where the cheek, no longer pale and cold, will glow with a never fading flush; the eye, no longer expressionless and dim in death, will glisten in immortality; the heart, now motionless and dead to joy as well as sorrow, will thrill with joy at the sight of friends—not professed friends, that will prove treacherous. The now silent voice will assist in swelling the loud anthems of worthy the Lamb that was slain. O, come, let us engage more heartily in the preparing work; let us be more earnest in trying to persuade our friends and all travelers to the judgment, to be holy, and prepared to meet God. Do you say you cannot talk with and exhort your friends; that you have not the gift? I presume if you have been in the way long, and cannot, it is because you have neglected the gift you have.

"But I am tired, and cannot." Cannot, christian, did you say? Drive the idle thought away; never let the erroneous word again from thy lips be heard.

Cannot! christian, scorn the thought!
You can do whate'er you ought.
Ever duty's call obey,
Strive to walk in wisdom's way,
Let the sinner, if he will,
Use the idle cannot still.
But you on Jesus' blood and God rely,
Trust and try—Trust and try.

Is it Ignorance?

BY D. T. T.

Tomb-stones and grave-yards preach the popular faith. Over the arched gateway of a certain burying-ground is seen, in capital letters, the magnificent word, "Immortality." And they who placed it there held that death and the tomb—instead of the resurrection—was the path to it. Were they ignorant? On a marble obelisk at Concord, under which lies dead and buried a son of Ex-president Pierce, is carved these words of Jesus, "Go thy way, thy son liveth;" and the parents of the lost boy, who was crushed by the cars, believed it, and not unlikely the pulpit endorsed the error. Were they ignorant? Did they not know that these words were said of a child that had not died, but had been by the Lord healed of sickness, and saved from death?—John 4: 51. Would Christ have used such language if the son had been dead? And yet Mr. P. carves on the same monument, where he says his son liveth, "Died, January 6th, 1853." Who knows anything from words?

On a tomb-stone in a cemetery near Hartford, Ct., is another with the name, age, death, etc., carved, and then comes these words, "She is not here, she is risen." A hundred eyes had perchance seen her deposited in her grave, and a hundred more knew she was there, but the pious lie must as ever be written overhead. Had the medical fraternity stolen the good sister from her shroud for the work of the scalpel and dissecting room? Or has the last day come, and in the imagination of such people was the graveyard emptied? Were they ignorant of the fact that these words were spoken of the Lord, not while he was dead and buried, but after he had come out bodily from the tomb?—Luke 24: 6. And what is worse, ten thousand pulpits ring out and help on these errors, and mangle the Scriptures just as bad when they talk about the dead. Why all this blind effort on the part of nominal orthodoxy to prop up the unscriptural notion and heresy everywhere advocated by the Spiritualist, who boldly declares that "Death is not death?" Verily, the church needs her eyes enlightened and a troop of angels here again, as on the Lord's resurrection morning, to shout in her dull ears "Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

Christendom has fallen in love with death, and in view of these things it is no wonder that the church turns away her eyes from "that last advent long desired,"—that blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. If to die is to die, then to live is to live; but if to die is to live then what is LIFE? Really the Scriptures need revising to accommodate these errorists, so that in recording decease they always may read, "And he lived!"

BRO. COTTON'S TRACT.—This is one of the best tracts to scatter among the people generally, that I know of. I have read it, and made a bargain with him to send to any one's address thirty copies for $1. The retail price is five cents each. There are plenty of brethren that could send a dollar and get thirty, and save fifty cents. Come, this is right and just, and you can and ought to do it, and be the means of doing good in two ways, and lose nothing. [illegible] H. MUNGER.

Exeter.

No doubt it will be good news to many to learn that the work of the Lord is going on in Exeter once more. It has been considered a hard place to labor in from a number of considerations. First, there are three or four grades of society. Second, the popular professors, like the old Jews, think or act as if they ought to command obedience. Third, the common poor think themselves quite too smart to be dictated, and little inclined to be sceptical about the subject of believing, as there is so little of it manifested in the lives of those who profess it. Fourth, there has been more effort made in this place than in any other place in the region, to spread light and truth; and the people have rejected it, and God has frowned upon them. The Adventists have lost much of their former power by throwing the gate wide open, and admitting every thing and body that wished to take a part; which has resulted in distraction of views and caused division of feeling, and the Spirit to be grieved, as in many other places where this low state of things has existed.

But a few brethren have tried to keep up the meeting, under discouraging circumstances, until the commencement of their protracted meeting, which commenced under unfavorable circumstances from outside influences. But in a few days God manifested his willingness to work with us, and sinners have been converted and backsliders reclaimed; some every day for three weeks have turned to the Lord, which has given character to the meeting, and scattered conviction through the town, and stopped the mouths of many gainsayers; and the work seems to have just begun. The last evening I was there, although very dark and rainy, we had to go to the Christian meeting-house to accommodate the people that came out to hear, which was kindly offered us by them. Some dozen said, by rising, Pray for me.

There have been some of the most remarkable cases of decision, followed by conversion, that I ever have seen. The work is thorough and still going on.

I am requested to say to brethren that have passed by Exeter heretofore, Give us a call, and a helping hand, for the Lord is with us. One good trait of the converts is, they immediately go to work for others, and those that have been backslidden for many years, have faced the congregation and confessed it publicly the first thing. This is God's approved way for backsliders.

I hope brethren will take this important and first step, and get out of the way of sinners in other places, and the same effect will follow.

Honey taken from the "Be's"

HIVED BY "M. K. H."

We have had two swarms of Be's hived in the Crisis. "Be's" are worthless unless they make honey, and in order to make honey, they must be working Be's.; and then they are profitable. There is "Be wise," a very profitable "Be" in conversation. It does not sting with slander and reproach, but administers grace to the hearers; always produces a good harvest of honey in society; is excellent in prayer meetings to mix with exhortation and warning. Among friends it is good to heal wounds caused by disunion and strife; a certain cure for bigotry and self-righteousness—will almost annihilate pride and popularity; when rightly applied, will produce purity and holiness; is opposed to partiality and hypocrisy.

There is "Be Patient," also, that works well with "Be wise," and makes excellent honey. It is good in tribulation; when faith is tried, we want honey from this "Be;" a good supply of it will produce experience, and then "Be Hopeful" sweetens our cup with honey, that endures unto eternal life.

"Be One" is the queen "Be." Without this one in the hive the work all stops. When a swarm is healthy, they all work in harmony, while "Be One" rules the swarm. "Be Content" is satisfied to move in harmony with "Be Learners," and delights in the company of "Be Diligent" and "Be Co-workers." These are indispensable in the upbuilding of God's cause.

"Be Cross-bearing" makes good honey, and is sister to "Be Blameless" and "Be Prudent"—very useful in society. "Be Merciful" and "Be Forgiving" are continually on the wing, sipping honey from every sweet plant, and delivering it to "Be Blessed." These, with "Be Praying," are good workers, and will have a good supply of honey.

Finally, the "Be's" are all good, and undoubtedly will be very profitable, if properly cared for. Let care be taken lest Mr. Worldly or Mr. Popularity get into the hive, in company with Mr. Discord, and destroy "Be One" and "Be Wise," so that the union is broken up, and then all the "Be's" will cease to work.

Let the "Be's" work—some of them must bring bread, and some honey. Give them all room. J. H.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Per steamship Nova Scotia, Liverpool advices of the 9th inst.

Public confidence, in the maintenance of peace, was considerably augmented by the resignation of Prince Napoleon of the Ministry of Algeria.

ITALY.

Arrests continue at Milan. Discontent was general, and there was complete stagnation in business.

There was continued activity in fortifying Pavia. New batteries have been erected, mounted with guns of the heaviest caliber.

PRUSSIA.

The young Prince has been christened under the name of Frederick William Victor Albert.

The political disquietude prevented the attendance of the English Royal family.

The Constitutionnel re-asserts that the French troops are evacuating Rome.

NAPLES.

The health of the King was such that it was supposed he would never be able to rule again. The Queen conducts all state affairs, and is reported to have caused the King to sign a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Austria.

It was reported that the Neapolitan Government offers to furnish the Pope four battalions of Swiss troops.

The Austrian troops were not likely to be withdrawn from Rome till all the usual formalities had been gone through with.

The Emperor was believed at the bottom to participate in the views of Prince Napoleon, and a report was current that his retirement would only be temporary.

[From the Austrian Circular.]

The language of German statesmen, as of the press, has widely spread the impression that Germany would look upon itself as threatened as a united Power, (Gesammtmacht,) if Austria, by an unjust attack on her possessions in Italy, should find herself called upon to take up arms against one of the greatest military Powers in Europe. The convictions of the whole of Germany have united in an energetic protest against a return to the days of the Confederation of the Rhine. With a common consent which commands respect, public opinion has declared that if the rupture of the public law of Europe should threaten a German Power, even should it only be at first in her non-German possessions, all her allies ought to make common cause with her, so as to preserve peace by the moral force of so powerful a union, and in case, against all expectation that result should not be obtained, would in common protect from attack the possessions of a member of the Confederation, as well as the sanctity of treaties; and thus shield at the same time, the honor, the dignity, the safety and the power of united Germany.

Under these circumstances, not a few German cabinets have expressed to us their wish to examine closely by what firm determination, and in what form a joint line of action, in case of an attack on Austria, could be adopted so as to be prepared at a moment's notice. On various sides our opinion has been sought on the state of affairs, especially as whether it would be opportune to provoke a declaration from the constitutional authority of the German Confederation, or to prepare resolutions for eventual adoption by that authority. This induces us to make confidentially known to [illegible] we upon the necessities of th[illegible]

This situation [illegible]ement in the political symp[illegible]dicate in a more restricted manner the existence of a danger of immediate war, but at the same time, by the absence of all guarantee that the explosion of war in Italy may take place at any moment, under any pretext whatever, and again threaten, in a serious manner, the peace of Europe. Faithful to its moderation and love of peace, the Austrian Cabinet will exert all its efforts to prevent ulterior complications. But we cannot close our eyes to the fact that, as long as the policy of Sardinia perseveres in its present character, contrary to the law of nations, and calculates upon war and revolution, war presents itself as the possible consequence of our firm resolution, to defend against every attack the rights of Austria in Italy, as resulting from treaties.

[From the Reply of the Confederation.]

The German Courts have seen with regret serious differences arise between Austria and France, and have not for an instant disguised from themselves the gravity of the dangers Europe would incur should those differences be prolonged.

A war like that which threatens to commence on the subject which they call the "Italian question," or the "Italian idea," must, more than any other war, cause uneasiness to the sovereigns and peoples of Europe. In such a war many sacred principles are involved and condemned to find their triumph or their humiliation on the field of battle.

The statements that Germany and its governments will experience on the day of foreign aggression against one of its members are perfectly well known to Austria. She can therefore rely upon the fact that, in case of need, the Diet of Frankfort, the solemn representative of the wishes, interests and honor of the common country, will know how to protect them, and adopt a line of conduct the most efficacious and most suited to the necessities of the case.

[From the London Post, March 6th.]

What principle of advantage could guide Bavaria to join in an Austrian war against France, and thus to give the French armies the alternative of advancing once more by the valley of the Danube, and repeating the triumph of Ulm on the Bavarian soil; thus rendering Bavaria simply the safeguard of Austria, and the Power first to be crushed, as the reward of its co-operation in a policy of Italian oppression.

[From the Paris correspondent of the London Post, March 7th.]

It is evident to all those who are conversant with diplomatic proceedings, that Lord Cowley is more particularly charged to bring about between France and Austria a state of feeling sufficiently friendly to serve as the basis of an ulterior negotiation, which would then assume an official character. In spite of the sinister prognostics which the manufacturers of news are pleased to propagate, we are happy to learn that the negotiation confided to Lord Cowley has already made an important progress. Certain principles are said to have been admitted on both sides, and this preliminary understanding will give rise to counter-propositions, the sole object of which will be to determine the bearing and the application of the principles so accepted.

By a despatch addressed to Prussia on the 22d ult., and communicated to the other German States, Austria points out the necessity of arming the federal fortresses, of making arrangements for the nomination of the commanders of the united forces of the Confederation, and of preventing the exportation of horses. Austria, however, out of regard to Prussia, consents to withhold these propositions from the Germanic Diet until the army of Italy shall have been put on a war footing. No mention is, however, made as to whether the army of Italy above alluded to is that belonging to Austria or that which France may wish to organize along the line of the Alps.

[FRENCH AID TO SARDINIA.—From the same.]

The threatening attitude of Austria towards Piedmont has induced the Cabinet of Count Cavour within the last few days, to draw the attention of the Emperor and his advisers to the fact. I have reason to believe the imperial government has again assured the government of Piedmont that any offensive movement on the part of Austria would be met by a French army.

Regeneration—A Query.

In the Crisis of the 26th., I find the following question, among others, answered by Bro. Hemenway.

"Does regeneration, or generation by the Holy Spirit, precede the New Birth?"

Answer.—"To regenerate, is to reproduce that which has been generated; consequently, the new birth is the regeneration or the reproduction of the man that has been generated."

I would like to ask—

1st. If the above be true, do not the wicked, if raised from the dead, experience a new birth? Are they not born again—born from the dead?

2d. If so, by what principle is it to be accomplished?

Will Bro. H., or some other person, to whose mind the subject is clear, please reply? Yours for truth.

Correspondence.

From R. E. Wood.

BRO. GRANT:—I feel it duty to spend a few moments in writing a few lines for the Crisis. I am a lone wanderer in this vale of sorrow and death. I find there is nothing inviting in this world, (under the present state of things,) to the way-worn pilgrim, that he should desire to stay here longer; but long for that brighter, that better land, having had a foretaste of the glory that is to be revealed at the coming of Jesus. I praise the Lord for the gift of his dear Son, and for the way of life and salvation; for the many precious promises contained in the Bible, that I can call them mine, that they are made to me. O how blessed! Praise the Lord. I have had many severe trials and afflictions for the year past, but I begin to see they are working for my good. "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose." O, I long for the New Jerusalem, the paradise of God! There we can eat of the fruit of the tree of life and live forever. Death, that dread monster, that hath laid so many of his subjects low beneath the cold clods of the valley, will have no dominion there, for which I can ascribe glory to God.

Obituary Notices.

Died, at Chester Factories, Mass., March 21st, 1859, HENRY KNOX, aged twenty-seven years.

Bro. Knox was a believer in the near approach of the Lord, and was comforted with the hope of life through Christ at the resurrection. I was called to attend the funeral, and strove to show the weeping friends and neighbors, from Job 14: 14, that Job was still waiting, and that the grave was his waiting place, (Job 17: 13,) and that there is hope of a tree, (14: 7,) but no hope for man but by the Resurrection.

J. K. BELLOWS.

Speaking well of Others.

If the disposition to speak well of others was universally prevalent, the world would become a comparative paradise. The opposite disposition is a Pandora-box, which, when opened, fills every neighborhood with pain and sorrow. How many enmities and heart-burnings flow from this source! How much happiness is interrupted and destroyed! Envy, jealousy, and the malignant spirit of evil, when they find vent by the lips, go forth on their mission like foul fiends, to blast the reputation and peace of others. Every one has imperfections, and in the conduct of the best there will be occasional faults which might seem to justify animadversion. It is a good rule, however, when there is occasion for fault finding, to do it privately to the erring one. This may prove salutary. It is a proof of interest in the individual, which will generally be taken kindly, if the manner of doing it be not offensive. The common and unchristian rule, on the contrary, is to proclaim the failings of others to all but themselves. This is unchristian, and shows a despicable heart.—Ex.

ONE VERSE.—Luther used to say that one verse of the Psalms was sufficient for the meditation of a day; and that he who, at the end of the day, found himself fully possessed of its sense and spirit, might consider his time well spent.

Notice.

There has been recently fitted up in this city a small but convenient house of worship, situated on Warren street, two doors below my residence, which is on the corner of Rumford and Warren streets. The house is open and free, without distinction of party, for all the servants of Jesus Christ who are now publishing the glad tidings of the soon coming kingdom. We are few in number and limited in means; but would say to any, and to all, who feel the cause of God at heart, and are willing to sacrifice for the same, that here is an open door. JONAS MERRIAM.

The Christian Warfare.

The Apostle Paul taught the churches in his travels, [illegible], and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. And this truth he had learned of the Lord, both by precept and example, and by his own personal experience; wherein he could say, "We are made a spectacle unto the world, unto angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honorable, but we are despised. Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling place; and labor, working with our own hands; being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we instruct: we are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day." (And why this reproach?) "For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." (Therefore,) "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh."

How unreservedly did Paul consecrate himself as a living sacrifice to the service of the living God; and how truly did he bear about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus. Read again, in his own history of his travels: "In labors more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings oft, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches." But notwithstanding the many severe trials, Paul cries out, "Who is weak, (or wearied,) and I am not weak? (or wearied?) Who is offended, and I burn not?" And at that trying time when, says Paul, "Alexander, the coppersmith, did me much evil," he could say, "The Lord reward him according to his works: of whom be thou ware also; for he hath greatly withstood our words. At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge. Notwithstanding, the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion."

And so this same Apostle could exhort his brethren at Rome, in the following language: "Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." (As says Peter,) "Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations, (or trials); that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried by fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ. . . . . . Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ: as obedient children, not fashioning yourself according to [illegible] lusts in your ignorance: but as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written, be ye holy, for I am holy."

What was it that sustained the Apostles and primitive christians in their trials? It was the word of the Lord; for he said, "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember the word that I said unto you, the servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep yours also. But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me. . . . . . These things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended. They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service. And these things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me. And when he had chosen the twelve, ... he lifted up his eyes on his disciples, and said, Blessed be ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God. Blessed are ye that hunger now; for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now; for ye shall laugh. Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. Rejoice, ye, on that day, and leap for joy: for, behold, your reward is great in heaven: for in the like manner did their fathers unto the prophets."

And now, "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and the power of his might. Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Therefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand: stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness; and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God: praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints," "That ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ." I feel to say with Joshua, of old: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Trial of Faith.

Faith doth sometimes latent lie,
While the Savior seems not nigh
To cheer and bless the aching heart,
Heal the wound and ease the smart.

Deeply then the soul doth mourn
For its loved one to return,—
"Give me Jesus, or I die!"
With deep anguish it doth cry.

Trembling one, thou need'st not fear!
Thy Deliverer is near —
Says Jesus, "By thy grief I see
A token that thou lovest me."

Thy tears do show thy love is true,
Let this knowledge comfort you;
Trust thou in the promise still,
Sink into God's blessed will.

He will end thy dismal night,
Turn thy darkness into light,
Cleanse from every stain thine heart,
And the sealing grace impart.

Listen! 'tis thy Savior's voice,
Bidding thy poor heart rejoice:
Cast away thy doubts and fears!
Cease thy mourning, dry thy tears!

Passive in His hands now lie,
On His faithful word rely,
Live by faith, and not by sight,
Keep his precepts with delight.

Thus may you each moment prove
That His very name is LOVE,
Triumphant be o'er every foe,
And rapidly in grace will grow.

ANSWER 1.—Does it follow, because the dwellers on the earth make the image, that they cannot refuse to worship it? Not knowing what your views are of the "sea-glass victors," I will suppose that they are the same as mine; to wit, that they are the living saints on the earth at the pouring out of the vials. If so, and all are killed who refuse to worship the image, would there be any sea-glass victors?

ANS. 2.—Certainly, if the undeceived ones are the ones threatened.

ANS. 3.—I understand from Daniel and John that forty-two months embrace all the time that the saints are to meet a bloody power in any form. If so, the two-horned beast might have all the power of the leopard, except that that God had decreed should end with forty-two months, or 1260 years.

ANS. 4.—Answered above.

ANS. 5.—No, far from it, for since I wrote the article in question, knowledge has increased in my mind, and I now see that the two-horned beast and the false prophet are the same. It is plain that the power will do wonders, both before and after the image is made.

Love.

"We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren."—1 John 3: 14.

These last days have presented many things to the christian church that are quite unpleasant, and among the rest, various questions have been brought up respecting theology, and held up by many as a test of christian character; yet, however much we may need test subjects in this day, one thing is certain, these subjects of strife, (or backslidden theology,) have made havoc, rather than health, in the christian church. No morbid sentiment, certainly, can fill the place designed to be filled by the element of love. Nothing, certainly, can be more properly exhibited, as a test to the christian faith, than the foundation upon which the whole fabric exists. That this is love, I think no one will attempt to deny. If so, then we have it in our text before us. And it is the test of tests—Love. My dear reader, suppose we try on this beautiful garment of love, and see if we are moulded so nearly after Christ, as to warrant us a perfect fit.

What is the character of his love? Is it a brutish love, that seeks merely its own base design? No. Is it a sectarian spirit? No. Is it a mere natural principle of philanthropic feeling? No; for then the various fraternities of the day whether moral, political, or christian, could claim heirship with Abraham. For it is as natural for the human heart to love those that are in unison with itself, as for the water to seek a downward grade. No! no! the great principle before us is as far in the advance of all these, as the christian religion is beyond American slavery! Suppose God would risk our eternal all upon a mere natural principle? The class of men that quote this text to prove their religion, very many of them, are entirely ignorant of its greater glories.

Let us, my readers, examine this great test principle of holy love; and I confess I know of no better way than to follow the pen of inspiration. Turn your mind to 1 John 5: 2.—"By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep his commandments." Here is a test that works vice versa with our first; first, we know we are God's, if we love the brethren, or his children; and here, second, we know we love the brethren, or his children, if we keep God's commandments. Now turn to John 13: 34.—"A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you." Therefore, the test requires us to love the brethren, just as Jesus loved the saints. But how well did Jesus love us? 1 John 3: 16.—"Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us, and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." Here then we have the test, love the brethren well enough to give your life for them. This does not look much like the tests that have been brought before us, my brethren! this is no test of man, but of the Bible; here is a test that will meet man in the judgment.

But who is my brother that I am thus to love? "He that doeth the will of my Father in heaven, the same is my mother, sister and brother."—Matt. 12: 50. Christian character, then, is the test; and the christian character is perfect love. Brn. and sisters, have you ever looked this test of christian character in the face before? Did you ever suppose that our love to each other was required to be as strong as life itself? No wonder prayer was made for Peter! No wonder Paul felt for his kinsman in the flesh! No wonder Christ supposed that, by such love as this, all men would know them as his disciples! No wonder that three thousand souls were converted in one day amid such strength! O what a bond of perfect love!

My readers, how does this garment fit you? Can you stand the test? If we love our brethren well enough to die for them; if we could give up our present life for them, what have we upon earth that we could deny them, if they were needy? Could we say, depart in peace; be ye filled, without helping them? Could we hate them, if they must needs differ from our faith? Could we speak evil of them while the Judge stands at the door? Could we drive them from our midst, and treat them unkindly, even while they were weeping tears of bitter sorrow over their past sins? O could we do it? I appeal to you!

O what a world, if this principle could be carried out by professors of religion! What a mighty engine would be the christian church! We would lay our track over the Southern plantation, and take on board the master and the slave! We would strike down the forests of unbelief, and burn them o'er with heavenly grace; we would cultivate soil upon a sin-cursed earth, in which should grow flowers that never fade.

My christian Brn. and Sisters, I beseech you look at this subject with candor. Cannot something be done to bring again the faith once delivered to the saints? Brn., write upon this subject; ye giants, write upon this for God! Stir the world once ere Jesus comes! Oh God, forgive my past life of sin, is my earnest cry, and make me able to dig some jewels for my Master's crown in glory. God help!

Correspondence.

From P. Tandy.

BRO. GRANT:—It is some time since I have written to the "little flock" everywhere spoken against by all who hate the truth. I feel that my time here is very short, and what I do here must be done quick, or never! I feel that I am doing but little for God—how can much be done, where so much superstition, selfishness, bigotry, popular fables, and cruel unbelief exist? O! I do feel to pray, that the mighty God would cause the deaf to hear, the blind to see, and the dumb to speak! How much precious time, talent, and money are expended to propagate error, and to build up sectarian divisions! Men are so in love with popular theology, that they prefer error to truth, and heathen philosophy to Bible theology. This only makes the words of the Apostle true; he said, that in the latter days men should heap to themselves teachers having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables. Is it not so now? Pride, ambition, love of money, fashion and custom, form a mighty whirlpool, into which a large majority of the human family are being drawn! Oh! their approaching doom! They have been often told their sinful course, and what their end must be; but, if they will not heed the solemn warnings, they must suffer the awfully sad consequence of meeting their offended Judge unprepared!

Let us, my dear brethren and sisters in the Lord, do our duty faithfully to all around us, as God requires of us, thus freeing our garments from the blood of precious souls. Let us always remember that "he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins." How very important then that we, as christians, "let our light so shine before men, that they seeing our good works may be led to glorify God." Friends of Jesus, be faithful.

Finally; I want to say to the faithful few, "Be of good cheer;" "It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."* The life we now live should be by faith on the Son of God. Then we shall grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. May we act circumspectly; redeem the time, "walking worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work." This will enable us to become permanently settled in the "blessed hope." And by putting on the whole armor of righteousness, we shall be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. Thus, we may be preserved blameless unto the glorious second coming of our Lord and Savior. But, my dear pilgrims, "we have need of patience; that after we have done the will of God, we might receive the promise; for yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." And may the ever living and eternal God help you to be encouraged to an unflinching perseverance, manfully going forward with firm and energetic steps until the crowning consummation,—till our Redeemer shall come in the glory of the Father, with the angels; then he will reward every man according to his works. Yours in hope of the Resurrection.

From Eld. W. Pratt.

BRO. GRANT:—I have been laboring in this region for a week past. Find a few brethren strong in the Lord and doing something to spread truth.

We have organized a church, which is not large; but the perseverance of the faithful, by the blessing of God, will increase their number. The candid and inquiring are coming out on the side of truth. The truth is working like leaven, and the dogma of endless misery, in many places, will be placed in its proper place ere long, I apprehend, i. e., among the papal dogmas. As to the opposition, we have our part from those who profess better things. And I find but little difference whether I preach the speedy coming kingdom, or life through Christ. Ministers, some of them, are doing all they can to prevent light from spreading on these great truths—prejudice all they can influence, and do what they can to shut us out of a place to hold meetings. But unfortunately for them, they carry their opposition so far that some of their members, satisfied of their unchristian conduct, leave them. We ought to be thankful we are counted worthy to suffer for the cause of truth.

BRO. GRANT:—The Lord has been pouring out his Spirit in this vicinity (west part of Concord, N. H.) in copious showers; backsliders have been reclaimed in large numbers, as well as many sinners converted. The last of autumn or the first of winter the revival commenced among the pupils of our school; several young ladies were under the most pungent conviction. Bro. Chamberlain, from Northfield, N. H., was invited to come and labor with us, and the work is still prospering. It has been my lot to be a teacher of youth for ten years previous to this, and two years the coming spring, I entered this school as a teacher; and I am therefore prepared to say, that many of these converts, if they should continue in the faith of christianity, will have the ability to do much for the cause of Christ.

Suffering and Reigning.

BY H. L. HASTINGS.

The word of God presents to our view the christian life and course in two distinct and important aspects. There is the state of shame and the state of glory, the state of trial and the state of triumph, the condition of labor, and the rest that remains. One is a state of warfare, the other of repose, one of doubt and fear and anxiety, and the other of assurance and of quiet confidence and peacefulness. And in all things pertaining to man we perceive an adaptation to these circumstances. There are two worlds. One groaning beneath a curse, the other delivered from the bondage of corruption. There are two physical conditions. The mortal, and the immortal. The natural body and the spiritual body—the vile body and the glorious body, the body sown in weakness and the body raised in power. There are two modes of govermental administration. There is the present evil world with Satan for its god—there is the world to come not subjected to Satan, nor yet to any inferior being, for unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, Heb. 2. 5; but subdued unto Christ alone.

All this agrees with the grand fact that the people of God are presented continually in a twofold aspect. There is the torn and scattered little flock, and there is the flock gathered into the one fold, and under the one shepherd; there is the church of pilgrims on the earth and the host of dwellers in the New Jerusalem; there is the church in great tribulation, and the church out of great tribulation; there is the church with tears flowing and the church with tears wiped away; there is the church with the cross on her back and the church with the crown on her brow; there is the church that sits like a captive daughter in the dust, and the church that sits in princely beauty at Christ's own right hand.

And it is the knowledge of this future glory that enables us to endure our present shame. It is the acquaintance that we have with this hope of our calling, and the information which we have received concerning the riches of our glorious inheritance that makes earthly sorrows so light and earthly woes so welcome to our hearts. This causes us to greet our light afflictions as blessed treasure-bringers who are laying up for us future glory exceeding and eternal.

And the hope of our future triumph is in a great measure dependent upon the fact of our present suffering for Jesus' sake. As Christ secured "the joy that was set before him" in all its glorious fulness, by enduring the cross and despising the shame, so we secure the assurance of our future blessedness by rejoicing in our transient afflictions for his name's sake. By fellowship with his sufferings and conformity to his death we have hope of attaining to the resurrection to life, and glory, and immortality in his presence. For if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him. And if we have hearty sympathy with Jesus in the trials of this state, we can say "I am crucified with Christ yet nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ that liveth in me."

To attain this sympathy with Christ, this fellow-ship of his sufferings which shall through the grace of God, both prepare and entitle us to share the splendor of his triumphant reign, we need these certain things.

FIRST:—We need much of the Spirit of God. We need his love shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. By this "one spirit" we are made to feel our union with the body of Christ, which is his church; and to sympathize with them in all their afflictions for his sake. Drinking deep from this fountain we shall be able to say "we have the mind of Christ." And if we have this so fully that we may say "As he is, even so are we in this world," we may cherish a joyous hope of reigning with him at last.

SECOND:—We need deep and tender sympathy with all the family of God.—If one member suffers all are to suffer with it. We are to remember those that are in bonds as being bound with them. We are to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. We are to be be bearers of each other's sorrows, and helpers of each other's joy.

If we do this we shall suffer with Christ in the person of his afflicted church. We shall not gratify ourselves while others suffer, but we shall deny ourselves that others may be benefited. We shall do good to all as we have opportunity, especially to those who are of the household of faith. We shall feed the hungry, clothe the naked, seek out the distressed, visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and thus exhibit to the world "pure Religion and undefiled before God and the Father." So when our hearts are broken by sympathy with the suffering family of God, we suffer with Christ, and participate in the enlarged sympathies of him who was rich and who became poor for our sakes.

THIRD:—We need that universal benevolence,—that love to all mankind, that Jesus felt. Our sympathies must not be restricted to christians,—if we love them that love us, we do no more than publicans and pharisees. That selfish love that glorifies the church and forgets the perishing sinner, that spends thousands for the world and pence for the cause of God does not entitle us to a seat at Christ's right hand. No, it is that spirit which seeks out the lost and labors to save them, which meets the divine approval. And when once baptized into this spirit and work, no cross is is too great, no trial too severe, no toil too arduous for the christian if it only brings sinners home to God. Labor is rest, shame is glory, reproach is honor, suffering is bliss, and pain is pleasure, if it only will eventuate in gathering sinners home to God. And if we possess this spirit then we suffer with Christ,—and if we thus suffer we shall also reign with him.

The suffering is present. The reigning future. The suffering is in fact, the reigning in faith. But faith makes the triumph as real as the trial,—the joy as sure as the sorrow. Faith clasps the promise—"If we suffer with him we shall also reign with him," and faith sees then in every thorn and every spear, in every chain and every fetter, in every faggot and every flame, the promise of eternal glory—of sublime and endless exaltation to Christ's own right hand. The bloody block is but the threshold of the golden palace, the gory axe but prepares us for the fadeless crown, the prison is but the portal of eternal bliss, the grave but the waiting chamber whence the beauteous and immortal bride shall emerge in joyous triumph to welcome her descending bridegroom and to repose in the holy ecstasy of his fond embrace. Reader, do you suffer with Christ? Have you laid all upon his altar? Are you living not for yourself but for Christ who died? The way to glory is neither flowery nor easy. Our flowers are blooming beyond the swelling flood. Let us not seek those that adorn the awful precipice which overhangs the lake of fire. O christians away! away! from worldly pleasure. Suffer that you may reign. Soon shall the crown be bestowed upon the faithful saints of the most high God. Soon shall the martyrs and apostles and saints come forth from their prison houses to reign with Christ. Reader, will you reign there? Are you suffering now? Are you preparing for that hour? Sinner, repent of sin. Backslider, return to God. Christian, be faithful till the Master comes.

"For the joy that's set before thee,
Bear a momentary pain,
Die, to live a life of glory,
Suffer, with the Lord to reign."

—Cross and Crown.

WHAT IS EARTH?—The following epigrammatic and singular lines are a complete answer to the question:—

What is earth, sexton? A place to dig graves;
What is earth, rich man? A place to work slaves;
What is earth, gray-beard? A place to grow old;
What is earth, miser? A place to dig gold;
What is earth, school-boy? A place for my play;
What is earth, maiden? A place to be gay;
What is earth, seamstress? A place where I weep;
What is earth, sluggard? A good place to sleep;
What is earth, soldier? A place for a battle;
What is earth, herdsman? A place to raise cattle;
What is earth, widow? A place of true sorrow;
What is earth, tradesman? I'll tell you to-morrow;
What is earth, sick man? 'T is nothing to me;
What is earth, sailor? My home is the sea;
What is earth, statesman? A place to win fame;
What is earth, author? I'll write there my name;
What is earth, monarch? For my realm 'tis given;
What is earth, Christian? The gateway to heaven.

What Amusements are Sinful.

In deciding what amusements are lawful and what are sinful, we may apply a few general principles. Thus:
